Crockett's Latest

S. R. Crockett has given us so many readable books since his "Stickit Minister" bade us sit up and take notice that there is now a cult of Crocketers ready and eager for each new story that comes from his pen. "Love's Young Dream" might have been called by some less vague title. It concerns young lovers, boy and girl in the first chapter when Duncan MacAlpine, assistant to his father, the head of the cillage academy, joined with his school fellows and neighbors, headed by the constable, to make a foray against an old, deserted mansion popularly believed to be haunted and lately showing some unexpected signs of habitation. The mysterious inhabitants revealed themselves to be not spiritual strays but a young girl in her early teens and a child of five years, the lawful inheritors of the estate, Irma and Sir Louis Maitland, who had hidden themselves away to escape from the treacherous plots of their uncle, Lalor Maitland, who, were the children out of the way, would be next in the succession to title and property. The scenes are set after the successful American revolt, and not so long after "the forty-five" but that men still suffered for their adherence to the lost cause of the Stuarts, when "traitors" and their families sojourned abroad for safety's sake and less honorable "gentlemen of misfortune" eased their hardships by playing the spy for both sides in succession and when skillful enough received both political preferment and pecuniary profit. Lalor Maitland was one of this delectable band, and two of the stirring incidents in the tale are his effort to regain possession of his young relatives by besieging their stronghold at the head of a band of "black smugglers" with the spirited resistance of Duncan MacAlpine and his sister, half-grown boy and girl that they were, who had come to reinforce the strength of the solitary Irma, and the battle-royal between these despised "blacks" and the "white smugglers" or free traders who regarded their own exploits as entirely exemplary and for that matter, had the tacit approval and secret assistance of their magistrates and masters. As a background to the plots of Lalor Maitland and the crimes committed by and for him we have an interior and intimate view of the household of a family of Cameronians and a picture of the old time schoolmaster, so intent on discovering a special aptitude for Latinity in his pupils that he scarcely recognizes any other form of knowledge as worth cultivation, and a glimpse of the hard, bare lives of the poor students at Edinburgh University. As a comic relief there is the poverty-stricken family of Boyd Conover, Irish and out of their element, Mrs. Conover, slatternly but industrious, Boyd the village ne'er do well attending to every one's affairs but his own, and the innumerable offspring, half starved and wholly neglected. The little Sir Louis Maitland who in his early years was an engaging and loveable child, will prove sadly disappointing for, instead of appreciating his sister's interest and loving care and the disinterested friendship of the Lyon family, he turned readily to the deceitful but showy Maitland and narrowly escaped adding one more to the list of tragedies. There is a humorous tang to the telling of the tale though the characters are all as sober as judges of the assizes. Duncan MacAlpine, who is the narrator in the first person, was someabout eighteen years of age when the coach guard confided to him the important secret that Mantoul was inhabited by ghosts, and he tells the early part of the story with all the exaggerated self-importance of a youth of that age projected into the midst of affairs. He has a boy's contempt for the courage and capacity of girls in general and sisters in particular. The Cameronian grandmother, Mary Lyon, dominates the scene wherever she enters, much as she did the affairs of her own household. It is a good story of its kind and perhaps the best commendation for Mr. Crockett's tales lies in the fact that the Scotch expatriates read them. From the Macmillan Company.

Notes of Authors

Dr. Stanley M. Rinehart and his wife, Mary Roberts Rinehart, recently spent a day at a camp meeting of Spiritualists at Lilydale, near Chautauqua. Dr. Rinehart is interested in all forms of neurasthenia, and he could not have found a finer point from which to take observations on the mediums, slate-writers, clairvoyants and their followers. Mrs. Rinehart turned the occasion to account in a different way. She says she gathered material enough for ten farce comedies and as many mystery stories, every one of them as good as "The Circular Staircase," "The Man in Lower Ten" and "When a Man Marries," the dramatized version of which bears the title "Seven Days."

F. Berkeley Smith, author of a number of books of more than passing interest, and whose "Village of Vagabonds" is still under discussion thought it was issued last May, and by the law of general average which governs the life of a book today, should be dead or moribund by now, six months after its appearance, is the son of F. Hopkinson Smith, author, artist and engineer.

The last volume of stories by O. Henry will be published in a few months under the title "Whirligigs." One of the oddities of character which marked this author was his persistent determination never to cast a vote for President of the United States until a southern man was given a nomination. In the somewhat less than ten years since Sydney Porter began to contribute to the pleasure of life for the benefit of his fellow mortals, he published ten volumes, an average of one a year, and yet his work was never hurried or scamped. It came with such an easy, natural, unstudied effect that it is doubtful whether readers in general realized that he was one of the most prolific of modern authors.

Myra Kelly's "Little Aliens," published last spring, at about the time of her death, was assumed to be the last work we should have from her pen, but stories enough for a new volume under the title of "New Faces" have been gathered up. She is the writer of whom it is told that, unlike most of the beginners in literature who are so certain of reaping fame and fortune at once that they begin to spend the proceeds of their genius as soon as they mail their first copy, she was fore-resigned to failure. She wrote her first tale, "A Christmas Present for a Lady," to satisfy her friends and family, but was so convinced that it would be returned again and again that, to save time and "have it over with" she mailed three copies simultaneously, being in complete ignorance of the proper form of procedure. The embarrassing result was that all three met with acceptance, each editor enclosing a larger check that his predecessor though of course there was nothing to do but accept the first offer and apologize to the others.

Thousand Oaks

Berkeley

In a Select Neighborhood

Many a wealthy family is today forced to sell the old home and move farther out because of the undesirable neighborhood which has grown up around it. That is because the home was built in an unrestricted section—perhaps before building restrictions were heard of.

Thousand Oaks is particularly fortunate in having no residence upon it except those now being built, and in having a neighborhood which is likewise well restricted and not as yet built up.

The grounds for the villa home of J. H. Spring, just northeast of Thousand Oaks are being laid out. There are 20 acres of this estate and the mansion is to cost $100,000. These elaborate and beautiful grounds are visible from Thousand Oaks.

Adjoining the Spring place and directly north of Thousand Oaks is our "Arlington Heights," a magnificent villa tract containing about fifty homesites which vary from one-fourth acre to an acre. We have placed a $10,000 restriction on this property; all the other properties have building restrictions of over $3000, thus the buyers of Thousand Oaks are assured desirable neighbors on every side.

No other residence tract has such an approach by rail as Thousand Oaks. The Southern Pacific electric lines will drop the commuter at a $25,000 station within 5 minutes walk of his home, through home line streets. Even the station will be located in a restricted residence district.

Step into our Berkeley office and let us take you out to Thousand Oaks. Phone or write for illustrated booklet.

The one blot upon the fame of Southern California, and the bar sinister on the escutcheon of Los Angeles is Harrison Grey Otis, a creature who is vile, infamous, degraded and putrescent. Here he sits in senile dementia, with gangrened heart and rotting brain, grimaacing at every reform and chattering in impotent rage against decency and morality, while he is going down to his grave in snarling infamy. Hiram Johnson.

The Making of Demons

Commenting on the foregoing paragraph in these columns on August 13th we said:

The thing most to be regretted about political strife is its tendency to make demons of men. We are bad enough at best; but when in the heat and dust of political contest men become thorough-paced sticklers for their passions and prejudices all the finer sentiments of human nature are extinguished. In their fury they attack their opponents tooth and nail, might and main, without scruple, without any regard to truth or justice, without remorse, without the faintest sense of the ugliness and enormity of their blind and implacable hatred.

To these sentiments we now wish to add that when perfervid oratory is made the vehicle of brutal personal vilification it is fully as conducive to breaches of the peace as the kind of journalism that is believed to have been responsible for the murderous assault on Mayor Gaynor and the assassination of President McKinley. We consider it very unfortunate that a candidate for the office of governor of this great State should have gone to Los Angeles in the midst of a strike to appeal to the mob by pouring venomous abuse on the object of its hatred.

The Los Angeles Atrocity

We assume that the atrocity that brought terror and sorrow to Los Angeles was the immediate outcome of a strike that has caused much fermentation of feeling in the southern metropolis. During the course of that strike there has been much impassioned oratory, a great deal of vilification. General Otis has been pictured as a most sinister figure, as the very incarnation of all the principles and prejudices abhorrent to the fanatics of organized labor; in short, as a creature so vile and infamous as to be a fit object of detestation to society in general. So there has been in Los Angeles much furious agitation of the kind that appeals to savage impulses, that kindles in depraved minds the most fiery contagions of principle and purpose. And now in view of all the circumstances it is not "silly," "outrageous," or "preposterous," as certain labor leaders have said, to surmise that the awful crime was perpetrated by way of resentment of the propaganda conducted by General Otis in support of the principles of industrial freedom. Of course it is incredible that organized labor in convention assembled, deliberately and with demoniac malice ordained the blowing up of the Los Angeles Times and the wholesale destruction of human life. Nobody believes that the crime was instigated by any lawfully constituted body of men. But it is not unreasonable to assume that strikers or their sympathizers connected with some industrial organization had a hand in the fiendish enterprise. It is argued that violence is injurious to the cause of organized labor. This is not to be disputed. Yet we know that strikes are frequently marked by bloodshed. We know, furthermore, that when everything dear and valuable to union men is at stake they are not more gentle and pacific of temperament than the average frenzied partisan. They have been known to exhibit a tendency to fiendishness. They have cruelly maimed non-union toilers. They have employed dynamite from motives of revenge. And all the while their leaders have vindicated their prejudice against violence by nothing more convincing than official bulletins fashioned for public consumption. But organized labor is not so much to blame for the violence of its members as the cowardly press that suppresses the news of crimes committed by strikers, and that never censures them for their violence or demands that they be punished. Non-union men have been brutally assaulted in this city within the last few months, and the news has been excluded from the columns of the daily press. An open-shop planing mill was blown up in Oakland several weeks ago, and the police have accepted the explanation of organized labor that the owner of the mill is guilty of the crime. The newspapers have had very little to say on the subject. They have seen no connection between this crime and the dynamiting of an open-shop mill in Salt Lake and of another in Seattle. If the people at large were permitted to know of the things that are done to men who resent the tyranny of organized labor it would not be long before an aroused public sentiment would put an end to the spasms of anarchy from which now we are never wholly free.

A Mischievous Principle

The Examiner tells us that crime is rampant in San Francisco, and that the city is in the hands of professional thieves who share their loot with corrupt officials. From what the Examiner tells us we infer that the crooks now occupying public office are as bold as were those of the Schmitz-Ruef regime. Now isn't this precisely what might have been expected in view of the attitude of the Examiner and other distinguished moral agents toward those thrifty individuals who were given an immunity bath some years ago? It probably has not been forgotten how our daily press for the purpose of conciliating organized labor affected profound sympathy for the Labor Party supervisors whose greed was so great that they were said to be capable of eating paint off houses. It will be remembered that to persuade the unions that the anti-graft crusade was not motivated in hostility to organized labor the daily press employed all the powers of its rhetoric to eradicate from the public mind the old-fashioned idea that the bribe-taker in public office is the most infamous of rascals. It will be remembered that a brand new principle of ethics was enunciated in those days, the principle that the Benedict Arnold who betrays his country is entitled to commiseration and compassion, the real enormity being not the act of betrayal but the purchasing of it. Nor, according to the proponents of this principle, does it matter whether the bargain be in the nature of extortion; the presumption must always be that the bribe-taker is the victim of temptation. And so in the days that are gone the bribe-takers, faithless public servants, the most despicable rogues that ever infested public office, were described as martyrs to corporation rapacity, and copious tears were shed for them by emotional special writers affected almost beyond expression by their pathetic plight. The attempt to inculcate this principle on the public mind was a failure as we have learned from the Halsey case in which the issue between the bribe-giver and the bribe-taker was clearly defined, the defendant taking the position that the company for which he was employed was "held up." But the effect of the pernicious teachings of our journalistic perverts seems not to have worn off. At any rate we are told that there are men in public office who apparently assume that public sentiment is by no means hostile to grafters.

The Great Reconciler

Some judges wish to be known as just judges, others, as terrors to evildoers, but Judge Graham, whatever be the nature of the fame he covets, has come to be known as The Great Reconciler. This title he has earned by making it the principal business of his office to extinguish animosities and antipathies, especially those that disrupt families. We do not know of any man engaged in the practice of any higher form of morality or in rendering any better service to the State. If the sanctity of marriage is all that the philosophers represent it to be then Judge Graham must be considered a great public benefactor. Doubtless he is so considered by the few who appreciate the great good that is accomplished by bringing peace to warring souls, concord to tumultuous households and happiness to little ones who have suffered the greatest agony that can come into the lives of children. But the business of making peace and reviving the sentiment of affection in hearts torn with misunderstandings does not appeal to popular imagination so much as spectacular demonstration of an abiding faith in the efficacy of the rod and the scourge as instruments of justice. And so the magazines are full of the doings of just judges who conceive the law to be the embodiment of the moral spasms of the people, and the punishment of a sinner the noblest work of God. These judges may be doing a great deal of good, but Judge Graham has no occasion to be envious of their fame; for there cannot be a more fortunate mortal than he through whom God bestows blessings on his creatures. If Judge Graham cannot point with pride to the severity of his sentences, or to the number of men that he has sent to the penitentiary, he has at least the satisfaction of knowing that in the performance of his duties he contributes to the whirligig of time none of its revenges. Tenderness is something that no man has ever to repent. We hope that Judge Graham will never cease to devote himself to the business of persuading people to end their quarrels; that he will continue to teach men and women that happiness in the married state depends on making small sacrifices with readiness and cheerfulness; that it is the duty of husband and wife to be affable, patient and good-humored with respect to each other's frailties, and that the last word is the most dangerous of infernal machines, never to be struggled for, always to be avoided. While judges who are terrors to evildoers are as essential to social order as the hangman, we have need also of zealous reconcilers to infuse a little more of the divine sentiment of love into the world. In these days when so many men have an intense consciousness of their own virtues and the kinship of their fellows with all the frailties and vices there is a sad lack of compassion and tenderness among mankind. Wrought up to a fanatical fury in the battle against wrong men have lost sight of the Christian ways of doing good. Little are they doing toward making life less difficult to one another. In the midst of such sentiments as now prevail, such activities as now almost exclusively engage the attention of men a judge of the temperament of Judge Graham is as exotic to his environment as a solitary missionary in the heart of Thibet. Judge Graham may well be proud of the title which has been given him by the newspapers rather in a spirit of levity than from a sense of the spiritual beauty that it implies. If we are correct in our conception of heaven there is more joy among the angels over the drying up of a single tear than over the deserved punishment of a thousand criminals.

Catholics in High Station

Among the one hundred thousand priests and laymen who took part in the solemn procession with which the Eucharistic Congress at Montreal closed its work were Sir Wilfred Laurier, Prime Minister of Canada, and many other high government officials, all of whom are devout communicants of the Catholic church. Several American journals have taken occasion to comment on the circumstance thus brought to their attention, that the actual head of the Canadian Government is a Catholic. While they do not confess that they regard it as remarkable that such should be the case unquestionably such is the fact; else why should they remark it? And it is not astonishing that they should regard it as remarkable. For in this country there is nothing more remote than the possibility of electing a Catholic to the presidency. The mere thought of the executive department being in the hands of a Catholic would be terrifying to many worthy people who believe that the doctrines of the church affirm the right of the Pope to interfere in the temporal affairs of States and demand for him the exclusive allegiance of its members. The supposition of these people is that no one professing the doctrines of the Catholic church can yield an honest allegiance to any other power. Yet history teaches us that allegiance to the Catholic church always has been weaker in Catholic countries than elsewhere. Such temporal power as the Popes have exercised had its origin in the circumstances and necessities of society at a particular stage of its progress, and it has steadily dwindled through the centuries. The worst enemies which the church has had to contend with in the last two hundred years have not been either Protestants or Turks, but the professedly Catholic governments of Europe. And while the church has suffered great injustice at the hands of these governments, it is probably the consensus of opinion among Catholics today that all that has been done toward diminishing the influence of the church in temporal affairs has been to her advantage as a religious institution. For such relations as have existed between church and State have not been wholesome to the church. Their effect has been to diminish reverence for the church among the people from whom she claimed the closest allegiance. Today the most devout Catholics are not to be found in the Latin countries. They are to be found in Germany where a Protestant government is giving encouragement to Catholic societies; in England where the King's oath was recently amended out of respect for the feelings of Catholics; in Canada where the head of the government is a Catholic, and here in the United States where the church of Rome is the only religious body that has no complaint to make about indifference to creed or neglect of spiritual practices. And here there is less danger from an honest Catholic in high station who knows the limitations of Papal power and the measure of obedience due to the Vatican than from an intriguing Protestant who might labor under the delusion that it would be to his advantage to do Vatican politics in the interest of a self-seeking Archbishop with an itch for a passport to the College of Cardinals.

The World's Portion

Give to the world forgetfulness—to me
The living joy of strong, sweet memory:
Oblivion's calm be theirs, and mine the strain
Of wild unrest, the piteous, proud disdain
That scorneth self, the faith in the "to be."

I would not if I could be falsely free,
The dear dead days are mine, and his, and we Are well content to love. What it calls gain Give to the world.

Perspective Impressions

Though the army of detectives engaged to hunt down the perpetrators of the dynamite outrage is not led by a brass band there is no lack of noise as it marches along.

The Sultan of Sulu, a reporter tells us, is not a man of many words. It is perhaps not singular that a man of many wives should be a man of few words.

Let us not delude ourselves with the notion that New Orleans is asleep. Our fight for the Fair is far from won.

The explanation of the emplotment of both Burns and Earl Rogers in the hunt for the dynamiters is that the people of Los Angeles believe that the attorney will be able to guard against a frame-up.

Now that we have Seymour for chief of police we shall probably see less of "Kid" Sullivan and his pals.

"Any man," says the Chronicle, "can call himself 'we' if he has a hookworm." Which reminds us that it was Senator Conklin who observed that the use of the pronoun in the first person plural was exclusively the privilege of editors and men with tapeworms.

Causes and Character of the Industrial Strife by which the Southern Metropolis Has Been Tormented for Months—Deeds of Violence

By Robert McTavish

Because Los Angeles is an open shop city it has always been regarded by the leaders of organized labor in San Francisco as the held where a hot labor battle would some day have to be fought. The decisive step toward the opening of hostilities was taken some time ago by the local leaders of the metal trades unions. Having placed a limitation upon output and stopped manufactures in this city, reducing San Francisco to the status of a repair center, these leaders decided that with the assistance of the Labor Council they would make the wage scale in Seattle, Portland and Los Angeles the same as that prevailing here; that hours should be made to conform with the eight-hour day enforced here; and that there should be the same limitation of output. When an attempt was made to enforce this decree the employers in Portland and Seattle locked out their men. When the demands were not acceded to in Los Angeles something like 3,000 men quit work and walked out.

The charge has been made by members of the Los Angeles Iron Founders' Association and by certain members of the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association that certain manufacturers and merchants in San Francisco lent connivance to the State Federation of Labor and the San Francisco Labor Council in this contest by furnishing financial assistance to the labor bodies. However that may be it is a matter of record that a number of unions throughout the State taxed their membership for the sinews of war. It is estimated that from San Francisco alone $5000 a month was sent to Los Angeles. Last week the Sacramento unions officially demanded an accounting from the officers of the San Francisco Labor Council who have had this matter in hand as the managers of the Los Angeles strike, and the donations from Sacramento have practically stopped. About twenty unions in this city, probably actuated by the same reasons, have ceased to donate. These have been threatened with discipline by the Labor Council, and some of them have been forced to continue the tax upon their members. The fight has been a losing one for the unions from the beginning; the reason being that public sentiment in Los Angeles, recognizing the prosperity-making conditions of the open shop policy, continues to be unqualifiedly in favor of it.

The eight-hour agreement and the wage scale prevalent in San Francisco were assured by an agreement between the unions and the San Francisco Metal Trades Association. This agreement was in force until June 1 and since then was continued for thirty days at a time by special agreement until September 20 when it was mutually agreed that the controversy should be placed in the hands of the new conciliatory board. A committee to handle the question is now in process of formation. The contention in San Francisco is that with the present wage scale, the present hours and an outrageous system of limiting output all competition is out of the question not only with the East but with all coast cities as well. Naturally this city has a deep interest in the outcome of the contests in these coast cities, particularly Los Angeles.

In the Los Angeles contest extreme violence has been the order of the day. It is claimed that if the union men there had been left to themselves there would have been no trouble, and that the regular visits of troublemakers from San Francisco have served to keep them at fever heat. Not only were the men who struck subject to orders of the San Francisco labor leaders, but about 1500 roustabouts have been enrolled as members of the unions on strike, and some of these do not know a lathe from a threshing machine or a machinist's hammer from a bucksaw. The object of the enrollment, it is said, was to gather in more turbulent characters and to make an additional excuse for collecting strike benefits. These have amounted to twenty-five cents a week from every man and woman in every union willing to be coerced to that extent. Other unions have voluntarily given larger amounts.

The strike has the sanction of Samuel Gompers and most of the time he has had a personal representative on the ground, an unfrocked minister named Stuart Reid. This man is shrewd and eloquent and his harangues have done a great deal to keep the strikers together and fired with enthusiasm.

The spirit of violence at first evidenced itself by beatings administered to the men at work. Growing bolder the strikers made an attack upon the free workmen who were employed on the Alexandria Hotel Annex, the construction of which is on the open-shop principle. An accident had occurred and Jim Jeffries' nephew, a young free workman, had been struck dead by a falling beam. The incautious remark of a woman caused a row which rapidly became a riot. The union men were apparently ready, for the implements they used in this fight were short crowbars and beer bottles filled with sand. Several policemen were very badly hurt, one having his skull fractured, while a workman had three ribs broken.

The ultimate argument is always dynamite. Previous to the explosion in the "Times" office an attempt was made to blow up the Hotel Alexandria Annex by the use of seventeen sticks of after this more dynamite was discovered in the after this more dynamite was discovered on the Los Angeles Hall of Records which is being erected by free workmen on the open shop principle.

In every instance union officials have stated that the dynamite so found had been placed there by owners or contractors for the purpose of creating public sympathy. In the case of the Hotel Alexandria Annex the man who had placed the dynamite was caught by the police. He was an ex-union man but just then employed by a farmer and had purchased the dynamite, he said, to blow out tree stumps, which is the same purpose expressed by the men who bought the dynamite that was exploded in the "Times" building. The man is still in jail.

During the course of the strike Los Angeles passed and enforced an ordinance against picketing. There are at the present time between 500 and 600 union pickets in jail or out on bail. The case of Karlsen was given precedence and went to the Court of Appeals in short order with a view, on the part of the unions, to have the anti-picketing ordinance declared unconstitutional. The Court of Appeals affirmed the decision of the lower court.

At all times since the inception of the strike the Los Angeles iron foundries and machine shops have had a full complement of capable men and have been able to deliver steel work in San Francisco at less than it could be made for here. One job is notable. In competition with San Francisco firms a Los Angeles firm secured a structural steel job in Eureka. The steel was bought in San Francisco, was shipped to Los Angeles, made up and reshipped to Eureka at less than the San Francisco bid. It is claimed in San Francisco that the difference of one hour in time and fifty cents in wages did not really affect this contract but that it was made possible by the removal of the limitation of output

Elizabethan Slang

According to the latest edition of Webster's Dictionary, one meaning of "lobster" is "a gullible, awkward, bungling or undesirable fellow." This meaning is supposed by most persons to be a modern development of slang. However, "lobster" was a favorite term of abuse among Englishmen of Queen Elizabeth's day, and Shakespeare may have denounced his callboy as a "lobster" when the boy failed to attend to his duties. Some students of the word think it probably was applied first to men with red faces. As signifying a soldier the term "lobster" is as old as Cromwell's day. Lord Clarendon, historian of the civil war in England, explains that it was applied to the Roundhead cuirassiers "because of the bright iron shells with which they were covered." Afterward British soldiers in their red uniforms were called "lobsters." Then came another development. The soldier in the red coat became a "boiled lobster," while the policeman in blue was, of course, an "unboiled" or "raw lobster." Again, "to boil a lobster" was for a man to enlist in the army and put on a red coat.

"Senator," asked the beautiful girl, "are you a regular or an insurgent?"

"I must decline, my dear young lady, to answer that question. It is my hope that the two wings of the party will have come together before it is necessary for me again to seek an election."

A Letter from Miss Maude Fay

Finken strasse 2, Munich.

My Dear Town Talk: I have just received your paper of September 3, 1910, containing an article about my London appearance. Your articles concerning my work and me have always pleased me and given me encouragement, were it for no other reason but to be for California that which it believes and expects I am capable of being. We receive a tremendous amount of force through the confidence others place in us. This I have always appreciated, so that in a case where I feel you have been misinformed concerning my doings as in the present case, I hasten to correct the same. Any person leading a public life is naturally at the mercy of the press in any country and is excessively grateful upon finding a paper which in its attitude is well meaning and is ready to print the truth. As such I value your paper. You must first of all allow me to alter the false impression concerning Mr. Beecham's Opera Company. Naturally it has not the long standing reputation that Covent Garden has—but a theater that engages such artists as Mme. Mildenburg of Vienna (the greatest singing actress on the stage today), Mlle. Fassbender, Edyth Walker, Clarena Whitehill, and next season Caruso, Geraldine Farrar, Mary Garden, etc., must be recognized. Covent Garden was by no means up to the standard of last season. Other than Mme. Destinn there was no woman artist of note in the company. Beecham is a man quite new at the profession but an exceptionally clever musician and conductor, and has attracted all music loving London. I went over at the request of Richard Strauss himself to create there the role of "Dicmut" in his opera "Feuersnot" in English. Like all Strauss' music it is not easily grasped and more so than any of his other works, belongs in Germany. The characters, music, coloring, etc., are all local—thoroughly German. The opera had more success in London than I expected but it is not one to appeal to English taste in general. The role Dicmut allowed me absolutely no vocal display—with exception of a short passage sung in a balcony scene, the entire role is almost recitative. However I had an exceptional reception—for London quite out of the ordinary. The public there is as a rule not in the least demonstrative. It interested me very much indeed to appear in London; to be able to judge for myself their standard of music; to feel my audience and the general musical atmosphere. It was all so entirely different from Munich. I have been asked for next season in London—but am undecided on account of continental engagements which may stand in way of it. Then a second point. My being "lured to London quite as much by desire of entering society," etc. That is absurd. Had it been true you are quite right, dear Town Talk, in warning me and giving me advice. But to say I accepted a luncheon on the day of my first appearance is quite foreign to all my principles as a singer. I do not even speak on the day of an opera, much less accept invitations. I have some charming English acquaintances, and as they are extremely hospitable and believed I should be lonesome, alone in London and visiting their city for the first time—naturally I received many invitations

As these invitations came from people playing roles in the social world, who after all belong quite as much to the public as one on the stage, my name was heard often. But I only wish to inform you that I accepted few invitations. This statement I make, not because I believe my social life really concerns anyone, but because I love my work and take it seriously and I should be unhappy to let the public think that I am not grateful for having a voice or am not making the necessary sacrifices (social or otherwise) to bring it as near to perfection as possible. A voice belongs to the world and the world has a right to demand the best. No singer can lead a social life and attain the highest in her art. After all I am quite contented with my social position here in Munich, one which I realize is quite unique—I being an American (I prefer saying Californian) and on the stage—two conditions rather difficult for conservative foreigners to accept. It is a position truly unselfish in its demands on me, leaving my time, energy and strength for my work. A London social life would make a wreck of my voice and me—so that it has no temptations for me. I like the English very much. Their way of living, etc., and I enjoyed every moment of my stay—mais c'est tout.

With sincerest greetings,

—Maude Fay

Bishop Nichols Amiably Protests

To the Editor of Town Talk:

My Dear Sir: To greet a good story with a broadening smile even when one is himself the subject of it, is as much the prerogative of the "cloth" as of the teller. And my attention having been called to a paragraph in your columns of October 1 in which you genially tell "one on me." I have joined in the full appreciation of the story. I trust that the hearty handgrasp with the royal Chinese guest, now that publicity is given to it, may have no further significance than of "hands across the sea" and not lead to any diplomatic complications with the Orient! It certainly will not if the Prince has a due sense of humor.

In the interest of cold prosaic fact, however, you will, I am sure, be willing to publish this disclaimer of my initiative in the said good American handshake. The credit of that must be given to another. If the truth must be told, when I was proceeding in line with my esteemed fellow citizens, to make my simple salaam de rigueur like a dutiful, if self-restrained Californian, a kindly prompting from some one by his side led the Prince graciously to offer me his hand. The surprise under the circumstances seemed to be mine, and the punctilio not to have returned the "glad hand" would, I submit, have been the real "mistake." And as to buttonholing the distinguished guest, my only recollection is that while I tried to look a welcome in his own tongue as well as ours, like the wise man who "could keep silent in seven languages," I was fairly successful in keeping silent in two. All of which goes to show that sometimes a real story is too true to be good.

Yours very sincerely,

—William F. Nichols.

The Easiest Way

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Arise, and with the sword of satire in your hand rescue Dramatic Criticism from the dungeon of Stupidity. My attention has been called to the fact that one of your contemporaries pronounced "The Easiest Way" beyond the pale of criticism, and said nothing more about it. Now wouldn't that jar you? So it appears that he have a disciple of Jeremy Collier in our midst, one that out-Colliers the prudish Puritan who was shocked by Shakespeare; for Jeremy was not cursed with the shame-faced diffidence that revolts at the very idea of discussing that which is indelicate. "The Easiest Way" is certainly indelicate of theme, but certainly not of treatment. There is all the difference between the two that exists between an obviously obscene nude and a nude that is chaste. To differentiate the two one must have taste and a knowledge of the principles of art; one must be able to catch the elemental distinction between the wit of Rabelais and the wit of Ovid. Professor Burton who was recently lecturing in this city ranked "The Easiest Way" among the very best of current American plays. Now I do not rank Burton among the greatest of critics, but I cite him for the purpose of showing that to the pure all things are not necessarily impure. In my judgment no contemporary American or English playwright has handled a moral problem with as much freedom from cant, with as great breadth of treatment with as much sincerity as Mr. Walter has handled his theme in "The Easiest Way." We are told that it is coarse and brutal. Of course it is. So is the Bible. So is Hamlet. But coarseness and brutality are not sins against morality. The really vicious dramas are those that exalt lust into love, give us fustian and buncombe masquerading as morality, and that rouse false sentiments by illicit means. The refined English dramas that purport to reveal the looseness of high society, that make light of the marital relation, that reveal to us well-bred women who have no regard for the Decalogue, yet who find favor with us in the soft light of the sympathy and grace that inform the plays in which they are presented; dramas flavored with defiant viciousness in which adroitness and seduction are the subjects of drawing-room conversation—these are the dramas that should revolt us, that should not be tolerated. Equally bad are plays of the style of "The Christian," that make use of the odor of sanctity to overcome the stench of the slums, plays that prostitute sacred symbols to the sordid uses of the theater, and that under pretense of preaching a moral lesson introduce us to prigs in priestly attire, and make them utter sanctimonious nonsense, cozening us the while into accepting as a heroine some sentimental wench of the concert-hall. Now "The Easiest Way" is coarse, but what a terrible indictment it presents against the libidinous and licentious rogues who dominate the theatrical world of New York; what impressive sidelights it throws on that world! There is nothing vicious in this play of subtle indecency, but it is vulgar, and its vulgarity has a leaven of moral intent and spiritual purpose that makes for something more than the so-called esoteric beauty of our refined dramas.

Do you know what Quality means in a Turkish Cigarette? If not get a box of "MILO." Then, any other cigarette, and try same, side by side. You'll notice the delicate, aromatic mildness of the "MILO." Mildness (yet with the richness in flavor) is what costs in Turkish Tobacco, and its just this that makes the Perfect Cigarette. You'll find it in No Other.

This perfection is obtained only by owning your own plantation in Turkey—the careful watchfulness from the seeding to the finished article.

More than Half a Rogue

By Eusebio Blasco (From the Spanish)

Not long ago there lived in Spain a father who had four sons, the eldest twenty-four, the second twenty-three, the third twenty-two and the youngest twenty-one. The father was a widower and a banker of great wealth.

As three of the sons had already a college degree—which is of no practical value in modern life—he called them all together one day and said:

"My sons, it is time that you should choose your professions. What do you desire to take up as your life work?"

Manuel, the eldest, replied:

"Father, I wish to be a lawyer."

"Very well," said the father, "a lawyer you shall be."

Antonio, the second, said:

"It is my ambition to be a physician."

"I have no objection," said the father. "A physician you shall be."

Jose, the third, declared he would like to follow his father's footsteps and enter upon a business career, to become a banker and attain wealth easily and quickly.

"I shall furnish you the necessary capital to carry out your purpose," replied the father.

The youngest of the brothers reflected and then said:

"Papa, I shall be a rogue!"

His words fell upon the circle like a thunderbolt. The father gave a start of astonishment and anger. The other brothers called him a wretch, an idler, an ungrateful son, a wicked brother and a pernicious citizen. Even the neighbors, upon hearing of his perverse determination, were scandalized, and the servants shook their heads, but it was of no avail, for the youngest repeated:

"I wish to be a rogue, and a rogue I shall be. If permission is not granted, I shall run away from home!"

So the father forbade him the house, cursing him roundly.

That night, Dimas, for that was his name, packed his trunk and, calling the oldest servant, one who had not yet heard of the affair, said to him:

"Ramon, I am going away on a visit and do not wish to disturb my father, but I am in trouble. Will you kindly lend me a thousand pesetas until next week?"

Ramon, who had feathered his nest, as the saying goes, counted out two hundred duros and handed them to the lad.

"Well," thought Dimas as he took leave of the establishment, "a debt is a debt, and consequently I am making a good start."

Twenty-five years had passed. Twenty-five years is a long time, but it had not been long enough to bring news of Dimas. The black sheep seemed to have disappeared entirely.

The father was now over seventy, aged and ill. He had lost his fortune in bad speculations. The last bank in which he had had money and credit had failed. Two or three friends to whom he had lent large sums, had departed for parts unknown and now the former financier who had once owned both town and country houses, driven in his own carriages and sat in his box at the opera, was living in a wretched twelve-duros-a-month room, forgotten or ignored by all his former friends to whom Fate had been kinder.

Strangely enough his sons had also suffered reverses.

Manuel, the lawyer, had tried but two cases during those twenty-five years, and he had lost them both, though his clients had the law on their side. His opponents had stood well with the authorities, had known deputies, senators and men of influence, and consequently won hands down. Manuel, in despair, had sought employment with a private concern and settled down at four hundred duros per year, less than enough to support his wife and five children. To be sure, a friendly deputy had obtained for him the Cross of Isabella, but that had been slight satisfaction, as, since Isabella's abdication, it was no longer the custom to wear that decoration.

Antonio, the physician, had succeeded no better. At the beginning of his practice two or three of his patients died under his care. It had been the will of Providence, for the diseases were incurable, but his colleagues and rivals lost no opportunity to call him a butcher, ignorant of medicine, adding that his father was a swindler, a crooked business man, and that invalids ought not to trust themselves to the son of such a father.

A boyhood friend, also a physician and an incapable one at that, had opened an office richly furnished and filled with imposing instruments. He had advertised freely in the papers promising the sure and rapid cure of all known and unknown diseases, at twenty duros per visit. This friend took pity on poor Antonio and obtained for him a place as consulting physician in an obscure, unfashionable sanitarium.

During the first season there he had fourteen patients. Two of them were high livers from Madrid and had impaired digestions, but instead of following the prescribed regime they spent their nights drinking and playing the guitar in the moonlight. One of them, after a prolonged bacchanalian revel, had a sudden attack and died in three days. His companion, who desired to escape without paying his bill, at once began to declare loudly that the waters were a fraud and that the doctor was a charlatan. Then he published articles to that effect in the newspapers and created quite a sensation. Dr. Antonio was, of course, discharged, and returned to Madrid disgraced and penniless.

After that he had no patients. He opened offices successively in small towns of Navarre, Aragon and Rioja, but to no avail. Discouraged, he returned again to Madrid and lived as best he could on the meager salary paid him by a druggist who played doctor and sold cure-alls of his own manufacture.

Jose, who had decided to be a banker, had steadily lost money, time and health. After failing in the larger world of finance, he started a general store—haberdashery, perfumery, canes, umbrellas, art and fancy goods. Commercial treaties, tariffs, hard times, rich clients who forgot to pay, others who bought on long credit, bills that he was obliged to settle, notes that were protested, all combined to bring about his ultimate failure. Then everyone said:

"Of course! A chip of the old block! How could it be otherwise?"

His competitors rejoiced, and his creditors had to make the best of the situation. So Don Jose was out of work and, seeing his wife and children facing starvation, accepted a position in the office of a weekly paper at a peseta and a half per day, and even that not always promptly paid.

The three brothers were now attempting to care for their father. He was almost paralyzed and entirely alone but for an awkward servant. Care and medicine were lacking, for the drugs prescribed by his son were too expensive to be bought. Sometimes when they were all gathered together in the squalid third-floor room, a conversation like the following would ensue:

"What can have become of Dimas?"

"He must be in jail," the father would say.

"He may have starved to death," Manuel would sometimes suggest.

"Perhaps he has been hanged."

"Strange that he has not written a word in all these years!"

"Ungrateful son!"

"A wretch!"

"A disgrace to the family!"

"Pray for him, my sons," the father would say.

"May the Lord have mercy upon the poor boy!"

One Sunday when they had thus gathered together in their father's room, the awkward servant entered with a sard, saying:

"Senor, a footman brought this to our door. The carriage is still there."

Manuel took the card and read:

"The Marquis of Sahagun!"

Great excitement prevailed. The chairs were put to rights. The invalid's bed was smoothed out. Each one instinctively assured himself that his necktie was in place. The pack of cards with which they had been playing at the father's bedside was removed from sight.

"A marquis coming to this little room on the third floor! Who can it be? The Marquis of Sahagun," said the old man, musing. "Sahagun is the name of my native village in the province of Leon, but I know of no such title."

"The Marquis of Sahagun," announced the servant.

A gentleman about forty-five years old, elegantly dressed, and wearing the badge of the Legion of Honor on the lapel of his coat, entered the room.

With one voice, they exclaimed:

"Dimas!"

It was indeed Dimas. Despite his reddish beard and hair now turning gray, they all recognized him. Dimas, approaching the bed, sank to his knees and said:

"Father, the prodigal son of old returned poor and ragged to his father's house. Times have changed and I return with wealth and fame. Will you forgive me?"

The man of wealth is surrounded by an atmosphere that always attracts and deceives the simple minded. The whole family saw at once that the return of Dimas meant comfort for all. Twenty-five years of curses and accusations were instantly forgotten.

"My beloved son!" exclaimed the father.

"Welcome!" added the rest.

Manuel, Antonio and Jose overwhelmed him with marks of affection. Dimas was a providence, a god.

After the exhilaration had subsided somewhat, the father said:

"Tell us, my son, how you have managed to attain so lofty a position in the world."

Dimas went to the door and locked it. Then when they were gathered close together about the bedside, he answered:

"By roguery, father."

The old man, thunderstruck, sat up in bed.

"Have no fear. I have done nothing for which

High Cost of Living in Germany

The meat question in Germany has become a grave political issue. It is not merely that the prices are so high as to be prohibitive for the poorer classes, or that the present emergency is temporarily acute. There is an actual dearth of meat. The high prices were bad enough in 1905 and 1906, when there were debates in the Reichstag and many legislative bodies, and protests and resolutions from all over the country. On the 30th of November, 1905, the then Prussian Minister of Agriculture, Herr von Podbielski, actually declared that the high prices were "merely a passing phenomenon"; but where there was then discomfort, there is today a real crisis. What angers the Liberal press in Germany is that much of the resultant suffering is quite unnecessary. By means of laws drawn by and passed by the Agrarians, all sorts of unreasonable restrictions upon importations, and too severe quarantine regulations, imports of cattle from the Argentine Republic, and from Denmark, Holland, and France, are practically prohibited. The Government could help at once by lowering the duties and the freight rates on cattle, and being less rigorous about the exclusion of cattle for medical reasons, while still protecting the country from animals suffering from tuberculosis. But it does nothing, because it is controlled by the Agrarians and the protectionists. Quite recently the city fathers of Berlin and Frankfort-on-the-Main have protested officially to the Government; the large cities are suffering the most.

Co-operation in Evanston

Nearly two hundred residents of Evanston, the Chicago suburb, have pledged their support to a co-operative grocery to be opened early in October and to be conducted on the plan which is followed by the co-operative stores in England. Purchasers will pay the market prices for what they buy, and at the end of the month, or of the quarter, the profits will be distributed in the form of dividends. Management of the store will be vested in a board of directors, and a competent Chicago grocer is to have the actual charge of the business. The promoters are very ambitious, and, if they succeed in the retail part of it, expect to go into it wholesale, and ultimately to control the producing part, so that food products will go direct from producer to consumer. The most interesting feature of the venture is the reported object of those in the movement, which is to have a store which they can control. Incidentally, however, they do hope to reduce their present cost of living.

Sacramento Leads in Street Work

Sacramento leads the State in street work. Figures compiled by City Engineer George Randle show that last year property owners of the capital were assessed $351,000 for street work. This does not include any money spent by the city in assisting property owners on streets once improved in getting better pavement, but represents only the amount of money property owners paid to have streets in front of their holdings improved. The figures are impressive and represent many miles of good roads. With the amount paid by the city added, the total goes over $400,000. This is only $80,000 less than the total amount paid in city taxes last year. Just as much street work is going on this year. Although much of the work is not far enough advanced at present so that an accurate estimate of this year's assessment can be made, it will probably be close to last year's figure. Nothing better tells of the progress of the community. None but a most prosperous city could afford to expend each year in street work the amount that is being paid by the Sacramento property owners.

Race Suicide in Kansas

Race suicide is so marked in Kansas that the schools in many country districts have been abandoned. In other localities the number of children is so limited that a consolidation of schools has become an important question. This condition is most prevalent in the principal agricultural counties of the State, and notably Jewell, the leading county of the State in corn, alfalfa and hogs. The annual decrease of children in Kansas is not peculiar to Jewell county. It is noticeable in all agricultural communities of native Americans. Up-to-date American farmers of Kansas are living on $100 per acre farms, selling $1 wheat and riding in automobiles, but they are not rearing children. Reports to the State superintendent of public instruction from other counties in Kansas corroborate the statement of the superintendent of Jewell county. These reports show that young American farmers are leaving the matter of raising children to the foreigner.

Postal Banks to Start Soon

According to a statement issued by the Post Office Department the committee designated to investigate and report as to details affecting the new postal savings bank has completed its work, and if the report is adopted by the Postmaster-General, the Attorney-General and the Secretary of the Treasury, who constitute the board of control under the law, nothing will prevent the beginning of the operation of the new system on November 1, the date at which it was originally predicted operations would begin. The committee makes recommendation as to everything necessary, even the post offices where the new system should be inaugurated. Deposit cards, with the stamps to be used for deposits of less than $1, flexible certificates, properly safeguarded, for deposits ranging from $1 to $50, and even to form and amount of the bonds for postal savings have been agreed upon by the committee. An official postal stamp to be used in official correspondence in the new system has also been prepared, as well as rules for the auditing of accounts that may be necessary and the payment of interest on deposits. In fact nothing stands in the way of starting the new system November 1 if the board of control approves the recommendations of the committee.

The Spectator

Our Discreet Dailies

Our timid, mob-coddling dailies have had some difficulty in handling the news from Los Angeles in a manner consistent with their policy of kow-towing to union labor. But so far their ingenuity has enabled them to keep the situation well in hand. On the morning of the explosion the Call and Examiner exhibited their ingenuity in a way that shows how great minds run in the same channel. In both papers appeared the statement of Harry E. Andrews, managing editor of the Times, with reference to the crime, and by each was the statement subjected to slight but important alteration. The only paper that published the true statement was the Chronicle. This is what Mr. Andrews said: "The Times building was destroyed by dynamite this morning by the enemies of industrial freedom." According to the Call Mr. Andrews said: "The Times was destroyed by dynamite this morning by the enemies of the paper." The Examiner being somewhat more conscientious than its licentious contemporary had the decency not to quote the statement. The Examiner tactfully put the matter in the third person thus: "The managing editor of the Times, Harry Andrews, stated positively at 2 o'clock this morning that the building was dynamited." Thus we see that contrary to popular notion cautiousness and circumspection are not foreign to the temperament of the great bullies of journalism. Indifferent as they may be to the sensibilities of weak individuals incapable of retaliation they discreetly avoid the corns of organized elements of strength.

Some Bulletinese

While two of our morning dailies are so extremely sensitive to the prejudices of union labor that they will sterilize the news to render it innocuous they will not attempt to delude their readers by means of fiction after the manner of the Boughten Bulletin. This journal published a story the other day, purporting to be a despatch from Los Angeles, to the effect that the Times explosion was believed to have been the work of Mexican revolutionists who hated General Otis because of his friendship for President Diaz. This story was invented by the editor of the Bulletin, a gentleman who has a great deal to say at times about "the poisoners of the press." Being a dull-witted individual it never occurred to him that in view of the attempt to blow up the home of the secretary of the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association of Los Angeles it would be impossible to give verisimilitude to a yarn so bald and unconvincing. It was no sooner printed than a cub reporter in the Bulletin office who didn't know that it was a masterpiece of the editor's genius pronounced it a puerile fake, saying "What the hell did Felix Zeehaendelaar have to do with the row in Mexico?" I'm afraid that cub reporter will lose his job.

The Urgent Expediency of Poison

The Bulletin's purpose in attempting to extinguish the suspicion that the outrage was perpetrated by the enemies of industrial freedom is not wholly animated by concern for organized labor. The Bulletin is more deeply concerned about the gubernatorial contest. The leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League movement in Los Angeles have been most assiduously cultivating the friendship of the unions. It was they that suggested immediately after the explosion that it was caused by gas. Their newspaper organs stuck to the gas theory until public opinion grew so warm that they abandoned it in panic terror, and now they are demanding that the strike be called off.

The Embarrassment of Hiram

It was under the auspices of these patriots that the Hon. Hiram Johnson rushed to Los Angeles when the strike was at a white heat, and drooled a lot of weak venom on the venerable editor of the Times. Unfortunately for Johnson he was billed to appear again in Los Angeles on the very night of the day on which the explosion occurred. In all probability he was primed with billingsgate for another assault on Otis, but the explosion made him eager for a pretext to call the meeting off. He did not wish to remind the people of the incendiary language that he used on the former visit. Came the news that General Otis had died suddenly on the train that was bearing him to Los Angeles. Here was the pretext. Quickly announcement of the postponement of the meeting was made. But the news of General Otis's death was greatly, nay, absurdly, exaggerated; for General Otis wasn't even sick. So the meeting was held, and Mr. Johnson, the fiery untamed spellbinder, the erstwhile compound of rage and righteous indignation, decided to lie fallow for awhile. He had something to say, but instead of roaring, as on the previous occasion, like a baited bull, he gave a very good imitation of a cooing dove. But his discretion of manner was not matched by shrewdness of speech. The preposterous gas theory was then in course of promulgation by Meyer Lissner and the other patriots, and Hiram, while lamenting the catastrophe, suggested that possibly it was an accident. So now Hiram has some fence-making to do in Los Angeles, and hence the theory that as one of the men that purchased the dynamite was a Spaniard the probability is that Mexican revolutionists blew up the Times building. Perhaps we may yet be told that the revolutionists thought that the Times building was Diaz's summer palace and that Zeehandelaar being a secretary was a member of his Cabinet. The fact is that Zeehandelaar looks like a Mexican and has but a slight Jewish cast of countenance.

Arrest of General Otis

Last Tuesday afternoon General Otis was arrested on a charge of libel preferred by Andrew J. Gallagher of this city. The warrant was served while General Otis was attending the funeral of his stenographer Wesley Reaves. Of course the service of the warrant in the midst of the funeral was not according to the wishes of the San Francisco labor leader. Doubtless if Mr. Gallagher had been consulted he would have advised that the service of the warrant be indefinitely postponed. For the arrest of General Otis at the funeral was a grim, an ugly contretemps the effect of which was as the striking of a diapason at a time when absolute silence was desired. The warrant for the arrest of General Otis was issued in this city weeks before the dynamite outrage. Its service was delayed because General Otis was out of the State. The purpose of the warrant is to have General Otis brought from his home to this city where organized labor is much more influential than in Los Angeles. The complaint on which the warrant is based charges General Otis with libel in having attributed dishonest and anarchistic motives to the union leaders of this city. And by a singular and unpleasant coincidence the man whose funeral General Otis was attending when arrested was the stenographer to whom he dictated the article of which Mr. Gallagher complains. Mr. Gallagher is one of the most active and enthusiastic labor leaders and a civic patriot of the Phelan-Spreckels-Johnson school. It was Mr. Gallagher, by the way, who, on Tuesday last, at the State labor convention offered the motion that the Los Angeles strike be not declared off "but that it continue until real industrial freedom—freedom of workingmen and women to have a voice in determining the condition of their labor—be established in Los Angeles and that we guarantee to the strikers every ounce of moral and financial support they may need." It should perhaps be explained that the continuance of the strike in Los Angeles is of the utmost importance to the unions of this city, the employers in the metal trades here having served notice on them that they must be prepared to have conditions in San Francisco and Los Angeles adjusted on the same basis.

Hiram's Friend Snook

From the Call I learn that the Hon. Hiram Johnson made a trip from Sacramento to Placerville last week as the guest of Mr. Frank Snook in that gentleman's automobile. The Call neglected to inform its readers that Mr. Snook is one of Sacramento's most prosperous citizens, or that he played an interesting part in the politics of the capital in the capacity of Secretary to Mayor Clark who reformed Sacramento under the guidance of the distinguished gentleman who now wishes to become governor that he may reform the whole State. The greatest achievement of these Sacramento reformers was the creation of what is known as "The Holy City," the temples of which are presided over by priestesses of humanity, as they are called by Lecky in his History of European Morals. These temples are owned by a syndicate, and a large block of the stock is owned by Mr. Johnson's friends of the Clark regime.

Dr. Brown of Oakland

The fashionable First Congregational Church of Oakland has not yet lost the services of the eloquent Dr. C. R. Brown. Some weeks ago I reported that Dr. Brown had his ear to the ground in anxious expectation of a call from Harvard. Now I am informed that this zealous preacher and pious minister is not to have his cherished expectations gratified. No Macedonian cry is to come to him from Harvard. Nevertheless he is not to remain in Oakland. He feels that his capacity for doing good in the community across the bay has been exhausted, and that it behooves him to scatter the seeds of christianity in new fields. He has discussed the matter with the Deacons, but what conclusion was come to I am not informed. Dr. Brown was to have attended the big annual convention of Congregational ministers in Tremont Temple, New York, but he changed his plans, a circumstance that has excited the curiosity of people across the bay who are very much interested in the present state of affairs in the Congregational Church. So prominent and active has Dr. Brown been in the social life of Oakland that representatives of all the jarring sects are watching for developments. Among them are many who will deeply deplore the going of Dr. Brown, for they regard him as one of the most zealous of uplifters, a consistent enemy of all kinds of sin. They hope that it will be many months before their favorite minister translates himself to other parts.

Margaret Illington's New Play

Margaret Illington and her manager-husband Ed Bowes have decided to accept the judgment of the San Francisco critics and the San Francisco public regarding "Until Eternity" and will make no effort to take it East with them. When they have completed the circuit of the small towns "Until Eternity" will be shelved in aeternum. Mr. and Mrs. Bowes left San Francisco with the hope that the interior would take more or less kindly to the play on account of its exuberance of melodrama and it remains to be seen whether their judgment in this respect is correct. The interior is not always as unsophisticated about plays as managers seem to think. The interior can tell a hawk from a handsaw even across the footlights. Meanwhile, however, Miss Illington is laying plans for a new production which will not be tried out in Tacoma but in a more critical atmosphere. Her new play will be "The Encounter," an adaptation from the French of Berton who wrote "Zaza." Whether "The Encounter" is as sultry as "Zaza" I do not know but I understand that it contains a good deal of Gallic spice which will have to be eliminated before the play is considered suitable for the American palate. Ralph E. Renaud, the talented dramatic critic of the Chronicle, is now at work fitting the play for presentation.

Newspaper Playwrights

The fact that Renaud, a newspaperman, has been asked to prepare this play for Margaret Illington reminds me of the significant fact that some of the most successful plays of the past two or three seasons were the work of reporters. The delicious comedy "Her Husband's Wife" in which Henry Miller is appearing at the Columbia is the work of a young newspaperman named A. E. Thomas. So greatly were the New York critics impressed with Thomas' first effort that they hailed him as the possible successor of Clyde Fitch. Thompson Buchanan who wrote the delightful "A Woman's Way" for Miss Grace George is another member of the journalistic craft. Cleveland Moffett, author of "The Battle" in which Wilton Lackaye is starring has been more successful as a newspaperman than as a playwright, judged by other than financial standards. And then of course there is Eugene Walter, author of "The Easiest Way," "Paid in Full" and other successful dramas.

The Personality of Walter

From all that I have heard Walter's is a curious personality and if his wonderful success as a playwright continues it is quite likely that a legend will grow about his name similar to that which is associated with the name and fame of Brinsley Sheridan. For years Walter was a reporter of erratic brilliance and unsteady habits. Owing to his convivial habits he never remained long on the staff of any newspaper and when funds were not forthcoming he was content to sleep on a bench in Madison Square. Owing to his big financial takings Walter no longer finds it necessary to couch with the vagrants of the metropolis but I am given to understand that his erratic habits have been in no wise modified. He never had much education and his conversation is like the talk of his characters, slangy, colloquial, without polish. It is said that he possesses the characteristic which Kipling confessed and justified by the example of Homer; "what 'e thought 'e might require, 'e went an' took—the same as me!" I believe that he was compelled to pay a Denver sketch writer $20,000 as a result of litigation over the third act of "Paid in Full" which the sketch writer claimed had been lifted from a sketch submitted to a dramatic agency with which Walter was connected. Walter is married to Miss Charlotte Walker, a capable actress of great personal charm.

George Cohan's Latest

The very latest success on Broadway is George Cohan's farce "Get-Rich-Quick Wallingford," founded of course on the story of the same name by George Randolph Chester who is also a newspaperman. This farce made an instantaneous hit and is due for a long run. It is of interest to San Franciscans because one of the principals in the cast who received special mention in the reviews is Miss Grace Goodall, the daughter of Mrs. Martin Schultz, a well known San Francisco singer. The critic of the New York Sun thinks that as a farce writer George Cohan is just a bit better than the late Charles Hoyt because while he has the Hoyt gift of producing pungent and suggestive caricatures of the American life of the moment he sticks closer to nature and has somewhat more regard for the probabilities. Some one, by the way, should write an essay on the recrudescence of farce. That George Cohan should turn his hand from musical comedy to farce indicates the swing of the tide for Cohan is nothing if not in touch with the humor of the moment. The popularity of "Seven Days" which is farce unalloyed indicates what the public appetite craves and we may look for a succession of farces from now on until the appetite is surfeited and turns to something else. Meanwhile it looks as though we will be going to the theater for some time to cultivate our laughing faculty and that is by no means an unattractive prospect.

The invalid was on the road to recovery and the physician had just presented his bill for $700. "Doctor," said the patient, "you missed the opportunity of your life. You should have been a nerve specialist."

The Good Pinchot

"Upon the whole," says the Chronicle, "it is perhaps unfortunate that Gifford Pinchot is not a rascal." The explanation of this piece of unfortunateness which the Chronicle gives is that were Mr. Pinchot a rascal "he would be found out in due time and then nobody would believe any more in the Pinchot theories." The Chronicle is of the opinion that "Mr. Pinchot's sincerity is the greatest obstacle to real conservation." Now this is all very interesting and it is all very amiable, but why should we assume that Mr. Pinchot is not a rascal? If men are so simple-minded as to believe that sincerity is a test of truth and evidence of right conduct; if Mr. Pinchot's mischievous theories are to be an obstacle to real conservation so long as there is belief in his sincerity, then it ought to be regarded as the duty of every editor to scrutinize his conduct closely with a view to ascertaining whether he is not a dissembler. If the Chronicle sincerely desires real conservation it should not deceive its readers by pretending to be able to inspect the innermost recesses of Mr. Pinchot's heart and decipher the symbols that are flaming there. With all its psychic powers this business of heart-reading, I happen to know, has never been mastered by my clairvoyant friend who sits up aloft at Kearny and Market. Exalted as he is above this terraqueous sphere the human heart, the sanctuary of thought, with all its complicated energies is above him. As a matter of fact this learned editor doesn't know his own heart.

By Way of Analysis

How much of sincerity there is in Mr. Pinchot no man knoweth. But it is to be hoped that he is sincere, that he is not merely covering his activities under the appearance of principle. But if it be permissible to judge a man by the company he keeps and the things that he does, then the editor of the Chronicle is in nowise bound to assume that Mr. Pinchot is not a rascal. We know that Mr. Pinchot is the boon companion of some of the worst rogues in California. We know that he is the head and front of the conspiracy against Secretary Ballinger, who was recently endorsed by the Saratoga convention in which one Theodore Roosevelt operated a steam-roller; and certainly honest men with a sense of decency cannot approve the methods employed to ruin Mr. Ballinger's reputation. And in this connection it may be worth while mentioning a fact that is not widely known touching the personal affairs of Mr. Pinchot. This is the fact of his intimate relations with Mr. E. W. Scripps of Santa Diego, proprietor of a news service, a multi-millionaire who appeals to the mob in one-cent papers and acknowledges that he has no other principle than that of making his papers a success.

Scripps Smashes Teddy

This intimacy between Pinchot and Scripps is a matter, in my opinion, of some significance. Mr. Scripps is fighting the battles of the insurgents, he is a warm advocate of the Pinchot policies, and of late he has held many conferences with the forester. Now the fact leaked out some weeks ago that the insurgent leaders were no longer infatuated with Theodore Roosevelt. It was explained that he was getting too much glory to suit the La Follette boomers, and that they have not so much confidence in him as in the Wisconsin Senator. Color was given to this story by the Wisconsin platform pronouncing La Follette the inventor and patentee of the insurgent policies and deprecating the bestowal of credit where it didn't belong. What has all this to do with Pinchot and Scripps? The answer is that immediately after the adoption of the platform in Saratoga the Scripps papers turned against Teddy, declaring that he had sold himself to the interests. So the question suggests itself—Did Scripps fly off the handle without consulting Pinchot, or did Pinchot acquiesce in the Scripps change of policy? Far be it from me to hazard an opinion. I am only recording a few truths and some phenomena which I think should be weighed by all who are inclined to speculate on the mysteries of politics. Mr. Pinchot, so far as I know, and doubtless so far as Mr. Roosevelt knows, is not only sincere but loyal. The circumstance that admirers have publicly judged him to be of the stuff out of which we fashion our Presidents may never have aroused in him that sinful ambition that so frequently o'erleaps itself. And though it is likely that Roosevelt's hearty approval of the Taft Administration at Saratoga was to Mr. Pinchot a bitter pill, who knows but that he swallowed it gracefully.

Moving the Tenderloin

It seems to me that the proposal of the police commissioners to transport the Tenderloin to the Barbary Coast has not received from the newspapers the attention to which so important a move is entitled. Nothing so radical has been proposed since our city fathers entertained the suggestion that the best interests of morality in San Francisco demanded the removal of Chinatown from its present location to the neighborhood of the county line. That was in the first flush of the rehabilitation period when so many of our patriots saw the new San Francisco rising from its ashes a veritable Spotless Town. The argument of morality for the transfer of Chinatown seemed unanswerable, but in the end the dictates of self-interest triumphed and the Chinese went back to their old quarter to spend money in fine new buildings and to add tremendously to the corporate wealth of the city. If the Chinese had been exiled to the city border our gloating moralists would have exulted for a time and then turned their attention to other reformations, while our business men would never have ceased to repent the folly. And just now I am wondering whether the removal of the Tenderloin would not produce very much the same result.

The Moral Aspect

Far be it from me to manifest any disrespect toward the ten commandments or to palliate the guilt of those who persist wantonly in the breaking of them. Still in my holy zeal for morality I cannot blind myself to the sad fact that vice is an inevitable concomitant of metropolitan life. The vicious we will always have with us, and as a natural consequence we cannot get rid of those who cater to the vicious. If it were possible for the police commission to exile vice and all its train just as Constantinople exiled its street dogs, San Francisco might become the sort of metropolis which the good women of the clubs and the good men of the uplift societies would be willing to stamp with the seal of their approval. But that is nothing less than a millennial possibility and I for one am not going to waste any more words on it. San Francisco must have a Tenderloin. For more years than some of our young reformers can number that Tenderloin has been lodged in a certain section, subject to more or less stringent police restraint according to the complexion of the police authorities. To recognize that the Tenderloin is in our midst and to attempt to regulate its various traffics, some of them incurably vicious, others less so and some of them quite legitimate, is not to compromise with vice or to make a pact with Beelzebub; it is simply acting according to the dictates of common sense.

Would It Be a Betterment?

To transfer the Tenderloin from its present location west of Powell street to the Barbary Coast would not work any moral reform of which I can be made cognizant. It would not enable the police to regulate vice any more capably than they can regulate it now if they want to. The present Tenderloin is just as easy to patrol as the Barbary Coast. The Barbary Coast is easy of access to those who wish to indulge in its purple and vicious attractions. There is not a single habitue of the Tenderloin who will be restrained from visiting the Barbary Coast if "the night life," so called, is concentrated there. For what reason then is the transfer to be made? Is San Francisco trying to fool itself by hiding vice from itself? Is the ostrich to be the inspiration of our municipal policy? For the life of me I cannot find an adequate argument based on the demands of morality for the proposed transfer. I cannot see where virtue is to be aided, but I can distinctly glimpse possibilities of danger which do not now exist.

Speculation in Coast Leases

It is always sad to discover that morality is being made the catpaw of designing persons, that the indignation of the righteous is being used by the unscrupulous for purposes of profit. I am afraid that something of the sort is happening in the agitation for the removal of the Tenderloin. With the motives of the prime movers in this proposition I shall not take issue but lurking in the background I see certain canny persons whose motives are those of the most sordid gain. Since the removal was broached there has been some very interesting speculation in Barbary Coast leases and the speculators are commonly supposed to be very close to the present municipal administration. Several of them bear names that have become familiar to those who delve into the traffics of vice, for they have fattened off human weakness for lo, these many years. Others are considered quite respectable men but they are not above turning a tainted penny when the opportunity presents itself in such alluring colors as at present. The situation reminds me of what happened in Sacramento when the "concentration camp" was formed in the lower part of the city. Some of the indignant reformers who backed that movement made handsome fortunes out of the change, thus proving to their own satisfaction that virtue is its own reward. The old and respectable adage would undoubtedly receive this same novel confirmation in San Francisco.

The Future of the Tenderloin

While the leaseholders of the Barbary Coast would reap a rich harvest the owners and leasers of the present Tenderloin would suffer a great loss. When we are taking the by-and-large view tion will not for many years warrant such an extension. Meanwhile the district would degenerate as the cross streets in the vicinity of Fillmore have degenerated since the business section moved down town.

He has never cultivated the pretty gift of saying sweet nothings and has never accustomed himself to smiling when they are addressed to him. A coterie of poets and story writers who dwell at Carmel-by-the-Sea learned this recently when Bierce was their guest at a dinner party. All the resources of their rhetoric were applied to

of a moral question the losses of individuals are not to be emphasized, but would not the city suffer a great loss too? What would be the future of the blocks from Eddy to O'Farrell streets and from the east side of Mason to the east side of Taylor? I cannot see how they could possibly be absorbed into the fashionable retail district of the north side which now extends as far west as Powell street without finding itself cramped. The Sultan of Sulu and Mrs. Longworth

One of the cherished stories of the yellow Sunday supplements has been swept into nothingness by the visit of the Sultan of Sulu to the United States. This is the story that the Sultan proposed for the hand of Mrs. Nick Longworth, then Miss Alice Roosevelt. It appears now that the story was manufactured out of whole cloth by some imaginative space writer. What actually occurred when the Sultan was presented to Miss Roosevelt in Jolo has just been told by Major Hugh L. Scott of the Fourteenth Cavalry who was present at the time and who officiated as cicerone to the Sultan in his American travels. Here is the way Major Scott tells the story: "One day during the visit of Mr. Taft and his party to Jolo the Sultan and several other Moros came to me and asked to be presented to Miss Roosevelt. The Sultan and his people knew that Miss Roosevelt was the daughter of the American President, and for that reason they looked upon her as a Princess, and as such desired the honor of her acquaintance. I told the Sultan that I would ask Miss Roosevelt if it would be agreeable for her to meet him and the other prominent Moros, and when I told Miss Roosevelt that the Sultan and the more powerful Moros desired to be presented she told me that she would be glad to meet them. The presentation took place in the ballroom of the Officers' Club at Jolo. In one respect it was rather amusing, for when the Sultan and the other Moros who were to meet Miss Roosevelt were assigned to their places in the ballroom, the Sultan was seated alongside his mortal enemy, Datto Jokonain, a Moro chief, who had formerly been at war with the Sultan. The Sultan and Jokonain glared at each other out of the corners of their eyes, but they swallowed their pride, and both were smiling from ear to ear when Miss Roosevelt, Mr. Taft, and the others of the Taft party entered the room. When Miss Roosevelt was presented to the Sultan he bowed profoundly and said a few courteous words through an interpreter, but he said nothing then, nor did he afterward, concerning a desire to make Miss Roosevelt the Sultana. That story, as I said before, was concocted out of whole cloth. Then Miss Roosevelt was presented to Datto Jokonain, and Jokonain promptly fished down into his pocket and brought forth a beautiful pearl, which he gave to Miss Roosevelt. This act on the part of Jokonain completely upset the Sultan, for the latter had not brought any present. He hung his head and was much mortified. For several moments he stood there apparently at a loss what to do. Then he happened to look down at his hands and saw on one of his fingers a splendid pearl ring. Quick as a flash he took the ring off, and, bowing profoundly, he presented it to Miss Roosevelt with the compliments of the Sultan of Sulu. That is the whole story out of which grew the untruthful one about the offer of marriage."

Alas for Santa Cruz!

It seems that those who seek the earthly paradise cannot hope to find the realization of their dream even in Santa Cruz. Santa Cruz has a multiplicity of attractions, natural and acquired; the former including its fair daughters and its debonaire sons no less than its pounding surf, its stimulating climate and its ozone-laden air; and the latter its almost bewildering array of artificial stimulants for summer hilarity assembled by the magic wand of a Swanton. But Santa Cruz is after all the abode of humanity and humanity is notoriously weak. It has remained for Theophilus Noel, the millionaire medicine man of Chicago, to place a quivering finger on the weakness of Santa Cruz. Listen to him: "At one time, as my friends all know, I had great hopes and expectations, and had selected Santa Cruz as the spot to nourish and develop them, after having for many years sought in vain to find one other place that so nearly filled my ideals on all scores. But alack! and alas! I did not calculate upon the Delilah and the Philistines following me as they did, and upon my being so unfortunate as not to have been able to employ one honest lawyer in Santa Cruz. Not but that there might be more than one there, but I was unfortunate." Not once but thrice unfortunate was Theophilus. That Santa Cruz has its honest lawyers goes without saying. I am optimist enough to assert that there are honest lawyers in nearly all the cities and towns of California. That Santa Cruz has its Philistines is probably not to be denied. Where is the breed not to be found? And as to its Delilahs—I will take my oath upon a stack of testaments that Santa Cruz has plenty of them, Delilahs for whom I, though no Samson, would gladly lose my none too luxuriant growth of hair. Theophilus is "in wrong"; he is unworthy of Santa Cruz.

"Mr. Smith," spoke up the young lawyer, "I come here as a representative of your neighbor, Tom Jones, with the commission to collect a debt due him."

"I congratulate you," answered Mr. Smith, "in obtaining so permanent a job at such an early stage in your career."

The Court-Martial of Lieut.-Col. Ames

That unfortunate dinner party at which Lieutenant-Colonel Robert F. Ames of the Twelfth Infantry, stationed at Fort William McKinley in Manila, entertained Lieutenant Janney and his wife Madeline McKissick Janney continues to work havoc to military discipline in the Philippines. Several times during the past few months I have had occasion to comment on the number of courts martial which have grown out of the tragic suicide of Lieutenant Janney when he discovered on that eventful occasion that his wine cooler was decorating the quarters of his superior officer. Lieutenant-Colonel Ames was court-martialed on two charges of conduct to the prejudice to good order and military discipline and conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman. The findings of the court-martial have reached this country. Although Lieutenant-Colonel Ames was exonerated from blame in certain particulars he was found guilty in others and sentenced to be reduced twelve numbers in grade. Brigadier-General Ramsay D. Potts has reviewed the case and has taken stern exception to the findings of the court, thereby presenting the anomaly of an inferior officer criticising his superior, for Brigadier-General John J. Pershing who was president of the court, is senior to General Potts on the lineal list.

General Potts' Criticism

General Potts makes the flat statement that the findings of the court-martial were at variance with the evidence on many of the charges and he holds the court responsible for a grave miscarriage of justice. While approving the sentence of the court to prevent the accused from escaping punishment General Potts shows his opinion of the findings in the following words, remarkable for their outspokenness: "Violations of quarantine regulations, admitted by the accused, and scandalous conduct with the wife of a young subaltern seem not to have impressed the court as military offences, while almost helpless intoxication in the presence of military inferiors and Filipinos is not condemned as unbecoming an officer and a gentleman. It is matter for regret that a representative body of officers should fail to stamp with their disapproval such acts as the evidence clearly shows to have been committed. The effect of such failure upon the military service must of necessity be bad, and to the public at large it must appear as a condonation of moral looseness and laxity in the service. The fact that the accused goes practically unpunished for acts opposed to all the best traditions of the army may well prove an incentive for others to do likewise, and the result will be laid at the door of this court."

Still Another Anomaly

This severe criticism of the court calls attention to another anomaly in this remarkable case. "Scandalous conduct with the wife of a young subaltern" did not impress the court as a military offense, although it is a serious offense in the opinion of the reviewing officer. Naturally this raises a question. Would the court have considered that a serious offense had been committed if the scandalous conduct had involved the wife, not of a subaltern but of a superior officer? In other words did the court take cognizance of the rank of the parties involved instead of considering the offense in its abstract heinousness? General Potts seems to imply that this was done. He seems to feel that officers will draw the inference that they may safely play the Lothario if they are careful not to direct their attentions to the wives of their superiors in rank. Surely that would be an outrageous application of the theory of rank for which army officers are such sticklers. It seems probable to me that the court-martial took the stand they did because they wanted to bring the whole miserable scandal to an end as quickly and as quietly as possible but the condemnation which General Potts has visited upon their findings has more than defeated their purpose. It bids fair to stir up a hornet's nest.

SAY NAY

By Miss Janet von Schroeder

Ah, next to light
Lies ever shade,
The sweetest flower
The one to fade
Or blow away.

And so good-bye,
Is not all vain?
Could fleeting time
Return again
E'en for a day!

'Twould be as fresh,
As dear, as fair,
'Twould fill our hearts
To leave them bare,
Ah nay! say nay!

Ways of Whistler

It was Whistler's custom when drowsy to go deliberately to sleep, no matter where or what the circumstances might be. At one dinner party his gentle snore suddenly aroused his neighbor, who nudged him violently with his elbow. "I say, Whistler," he protested excitedly, "you must not sleep here!" Leave me alone!" snapped Whistler. "I've said all I wanted to. I've no interest at all in what you and your friends have to say." One evening he was a guest at a hotel, as was also Edwin A. Abbey, and immediately after the dinner was served went calmly to sleep. On the way to the theater he had another nap in the cab. He also slumbered peacefully through the play. The next morning he blandly asked: "What did Abbey have to say last night? Anything worth while?"

Murine is an Eye Tonic and they know, if it is used regularly, that it Tones the Eye of the Growing Child and in many instances obviates the use of Glasses, and is it not reasonable that Glasses when not required will retard the development of a young and growing Eye?

Murine, through its Tonic effect, Stimulates Healthy Circulation and thus promotes the normal development of the Eye. A Silk Pajama Party

Can you imagine anything more interesting than a drawing room full of fair maids and frolicsome boys all arrayed in silk pajamas and having the time of their lives at half after two in the morning? And can you imagine anything more startling than the sudden appearance of an uninvited guest when the mirth was most obstreperous? And suppose that uninvited guest happened to be the elder brother of the youngster giving the party, can't you—but let me tell the story in my own way. You see, it happens that a certain family which numbers several sons, all of whom have a talent for doing the unexpected, has been spending the summer in Ross Valley—please don't interrupt and I'll get to the silk pajamas as quickly as possible. Of course there have been times when the boys found it impossible to catch the last boat to Sausalito—restrain your impatience, we are really making progress with our tale. On such occasions they have been in the habit of spending the night in the family home in Washington street. The home, by the way, is a new home and very beautiful, but during the summer it has been left in charge of a single servant.

When Elder Brother Went Home

Now let me see, where were we? Oh yes, we were speaking of the beautiful home and of the silk pajama party—I assure you, we will get to the pajamas right away. It was just this way. One night—to be precise it was just two hours and a half past the midnight of September 8—Elder Brother—I see no reason for giving his name—appeared in Washington street with the very sensible intent of letting himself into the house and retiring to bed. Imagine his surprise to find the house ablaze with lights and the open windows of the drawing room discharging a riot of music and laughter on the chill morning breeze. He rubbed his eyes. Could he be dreaming? He pinched himself. No, he was not dreaming. There was substantial volume to the music and the laughter, there was more than the light-o'-dreams in the brilliant electrical display and there was nothing ghostly about the line of carriages and limousines that extended the length of the block. With logical stubbornness Elder Brother concluded that a party was being given in his home, despite the absence of the family in Ross Valley.

Now We Come to the Pajamas

Stealthily Elder Brother tiptoed up the stairs, stealthily he inserted his latch key and as stealthily he opened the door. None of the merrymakers heard his approach as in breathless amazement he surveyed the scene before him. Two score youngsters, boys and girls, were having the time of their young lives in that drawing room and every blessed mother's son and daughter of them was arrayed in silk pajamas. There were pink silk pajamas and blue silk pajamas, cerise and magenta and scarlet silk pajamas; there were silk pajamas of every color of the spectroscopic from blush red to ultra-violet; and inside the pajamas were some of the prettiest maids, not to mention some of the handsomest youths, of the town. Younger Brother was master of the revels. Half a dozen of the merrymakers were sprawling on the piano and scrambling at the keys while as many more were wheeling the instrument about the floor. Others were dancing and singing—but just then they all caught sight of Elder Brother gaping at the revels. There were screams of surprise and a hasty run to cover—but why dilate on the embarrassing situation. The next time Younger Brother arranges a party he will first make sure that Elder Brother will be out of town. Meanwhile there is a good deal of constraint when Elder Brother meets Younger Brother's friends. And in the household the word "pajamas" is tabooed.

At the Darrach Recital

The recital which Marshall Darrach gave at the St. Francis on Tuesday night was rather impressively heralded as the opening of the winter season. It was announced by the bavardes that all the darlings of society would be there and that the very latest Parisian effects in bibs and tuckers would be on display. Naturally this was just the sort of press agency to attract the climbers and the nobodies who are never quite so happy and at the same time quite so miserable as when they are given a peep across the impregnable fortification of the promised land. So there were plenty of climbers and nobodies present to rub elbows in the cause of Shakespearian study with the real blown-in-the-bottle social swells. Of the simon-pure exclusives there was a goodly sprinkling. Also—but this is a mere detail—there were present a handful or so of sincere lovers of the drama who came to hear Darrach rather than to see or be seen by the audience. These last betrayed a most unfashionable interest in the recital, giving such evident attention to the interpretation of the noble lines of "The Tempest" that it was no trick at all to differentiate them from the real somebodies of society.

A Rather Disappointing Show

As a dress parade the recital did not come up to the specifications. There were a few very beautiful gowns and there were still fewer ne ones; but the bulk of those present were content to come in costumes which have done duty many times before on social occasions of inferior importance. Of course it is manifestly impossible to open the social season with a function of purely artistic character and if some of the patronesses of the Darrach recital thought they could effect a revolution in the established rules that govern such things they must have been grievously disappointed. As a matter of fact a great many of the patronesses did not make their appearance at all. They knew they would get their names into the papers anyway, so why should they put themselves to the trouble of listening to an old-fashioned poet's fantastic line for an hour and a half? "The Tempest," you know, is a sort of a fairy tale and the only fair tales which are actually popular in society are those which hubby tells his wife when he has been out with the boys and those which wifey tells her husband to cover up her losses at bridge. As for those benighted individuals who thought that in attending the Darrach recital they were really assisting at the inauguration of the winter season it is only necessary to say that they were induced to submit to a cultural ordeal under false pretenses. They may regret the mistake but it can not have done them much harm—or much good.

Some Interesting Incidents

Aside from the fine work of Mr. Darrach there were some interesting circumstances to hold the attention of the audience. There was Mrs. Eleanor Martin, for instance. Always interesting Mrs. Martin was an object of absorbing attention to a great part of the audience. Sitting one of the boxes with her daughter-in-law Mrs. Walter Martin, she maintained that aspect of imperturbable gravity which always mantles her features on occasions of a purely artistic character. Not even during the recitation of the comic passages between Trinculo, Stephano and Caliban did Mrs. Eleanor Martin deign to smile, though a great part of the audience relaxed their aristocratic risibles. Several times Mrs. Martin's eyes closed as though in rhapsodic reverie over the lines of the bard—or it may have been in somnolence—but if she was really tempted to yield to the soft allurements of slumber she stubbornly resisted to the bitter end. Could Mr. Shakespeare and Mr. Darrach ask a greater tribute? Mr. Downey Harvey was in the box while Mr. Walter Martin was not, a circumstance which seems to indicate that Mr. Harvey's zeal for culture exceeds that of his half-brother. Another interesting incident was supplied by an elderly matron who fanned herself with such audible vigor as to attract the attention of the greater part of the audience while Ferdinand was paying love made to him by Miranda. Her fan must have needed oiling for in its swinging to and fro it emitted a rattle. Being deaf the elderly matron was blissfully unconscious that her noisy fanning was interesting the audience more than Shakespeare, but when the pretty maid who accompanied her whispered in her ear she smilingly brought the diversion to an end and the audience lent ear to Mr. Darrach. Hardly less interesting were the comments which the fashionables made as they emerged from the ball room. "What a splendid memory Mr. Darrach has! Fancy his knowing all that by heart!" was the burden of their criticism. Could Mr. Darrach ask for more discerning appreciation?

Shakespeare is Not Fashionable

When the recital was at an end I seized the opportunity to hear what one of the ladies who had been present thought of it all. She very frankly told me that Shakespeare is not popular in society. "Didn't he hold horses in front of a theater or something equally impossible?" she demanded with a twinkle in her eye. She thought that the line which met with the greatest approval from the audience was Prospero's "Be cheerful, sir; our revels now are ended." She hazarded the statement that there is no fashionable road to the appreciation of the great bard and she did not think that more than fifty in the audience had ever read "The Tempest." "I say fifty," she explained, "because I am of a charitable disposition." And with feminine discernment she declared that the men who were there probably found greater delight in the beauty of Mrs. Walter Scott Franklin than in the beauties of the poet. I was inclined to agree with her, for the exquisite beauty of Mrs. Franklin set off by a beautiful gown certainly attracted a great deal of attention.

Miss Maude Fay Explains

In another column is published a letter from Miss Maude Fay, the highly gifted singer of whose success on the operatic stage San Franciscans are very proud. This letter was called forth by two paragraphs which I wrote last month apropos Miss Fay's London debut. From a person who is very much interested in Miss Fay's future I had learned certain things which, it seemed to me, ought to be published as a gentle warning to the singer. They concerned her social activities in London, and were commented on in no carping spirit but in the same spirit of solicitude for her professional welfare which prompted their communication to me by one who has Miss Fay's best interests at heart. It is extremely interesting to hear Miss Fay's side of the story, particularly as it corrects one or two misapprehensions which crept into mine. Miss Fay makes it apparent that the temptations of society are not strong enough to lure her from her artistic career and that is the principal point at issue. I am glad that she has reassured all her San Francisco friends on this point. Our good wishes for her future are constant and her success thus far has been proportionate to our liveliest expectations.

She Met the Sultan of Sulu

Who was the very pretty young woman who had the distinction of being presented to the Sultan of Sulu in Tecau's on Monday night? That was the question which was buzzed about among the after-theater crowd, but nobody seemed to be able to throw light upon her identity. That she was a very attractive young woman there can be no doubt, for her brunette beauty drew many eyes before she was presented to the sepia royalty. The Prince and his entourage went to the cafe after attending the theater and it was after he had supped and was on his way out that the introduction took place. The fair unknown went through the formality with smiling aplomb while the Filipino ruler exhibited considerable awkwardness. Of course every eye in the room was focussed on the scene and the young woman first blushed and then laughed as she resumed her seat. She was not overpowered by the bow and handshake of royalty.

"How Much Can a Little Tell?"

It is no flattery to answer that a little can tell a great deal when that little is interpreted by two maids like Miss Janet von Schroeder and Miss Marie Louise Foster. The one with her pencil and the other with her pen have made a very graceful volume, a volume that breathes throughout the fragrant spirit of maidenhood. It is a pretty picture which they show to the mind's eye—two fair maids bending in earnest observation over the wildflowers of their native State and daydreaming tender meanings into their cups and bells. The talents of the two girls are seen unfolding leaf by leaf like the blossoms of the countryside where they found their inspiration. Miss von Schroeder has the literary bent while Miss Foster's is artistic. It would be idle to attempt to decide which is the better gift. Both young ladies have advanced so far as to be able to infuse their personal delicacy, the one into gracefully turned phrases, the other into decorative lines. The book would have been larger had not Miss von Schroeder, with the natural eagerness of one who publishes for the first time, desired to see it before leaving with her family for Europe. On that account its publication was hurried and matter which would have been included had it been deferred till the Christmastide, as at first intended, was left out. The revision too was a little scamped, I have no doubt, for there are several of the errors in spelling which seem inevitable when a girl takes up her pen.

A Young Lady of Sentiment

There can be no doubt that Miss von Schroeder is a young lady of sentiment. More than that, she has a gift of graceful expression. Some of her sentences are arresting; like delicate scents they leave a perfume, charming but elusive, in the mind. "Droop not thy lids in sorrow," she says, "lest happiness in passing should find them closed." That is a worthy admonition framed in fitting language. "The giving heart is like a flower that gladly exhales all its sweetest perfume and still has fragrance left." Is not that an appropriate thought for the page on which Miss Foster has given us in delicate tracery the wild rose of California? "Does deception destroy confidence? or some strange longing to trust teach us yet to defy unbelief?" This is a sentence that reveals the youthful thinker reaching out to grasp the mysteries of the mind. "If no good deed is spent in vain, how fatal every act of evil!" Here we have the moralist shaking her pretty head at the wickedness of the world. "Great may be the thought inspired by a flower, yet its Maker's thought is the flower itself." There is a poem in those simple lines. "When

The Rooney-Titus Engagement

A more interesting bit of news than that which joins the names of Miss Alice Rooney and Mr. Louis Titus in an engagement announcement has not been placed before society for some time. Miss Rooney is a young lady of unusual beauty and her natural talents have been so carefully cultivated by study and travel that she exercises a fascinating influence upon her large circle of friends. She is a cousin of Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt Jr. and Mrs. Herman Oelrichs. Mr. Titus is a lawyer of recognized ability who has lately devoted a great deal of time to his oil interests. In clubdom he is extremely popular, being a leading spirit at the Pacific-Union, Bohemian and Claremont. The wedding is to take place in November.

In the Social Spotlight

Miss Ysobel Chase, the attractive daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Horace Blanchard Chase, will be a debutante this season and will make her social bow soon after the first Greenway assembly, November 4. Instead of adhering to the custom of making her first formal appearance at a tea, the more elaborate mode of a ball will be followed. Miss Ysobel Chase's ball will be given by Mrs. Will Tevis and will be held in the white and gold Louis XIV. ball room at the Palace Hotel. It will be a most elaborate affair.

Mr. Donald Maclean opened the season with a brilliant musicale at his studio, 1613 Green street on Sunday evening last. An exceptional program was presented, the Serenade from Massenet's "Don Quichotte" being sung for the first time here.

Mr. Peter McG. McBean is at the Fairmont after spending the summer in Washington, New York and Newport. Mrs. Henry Stevens Kiersted accompanied Mr. McBean to San Francisco, Mrs. McBean remaining in the east for a few weeks. Later she will join Mr. McBean at the Fairmont where they have taken apartments for the winter. Dr. Kiersted met his wife at the Fairmont coming up from their home at Lincoln.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at Hotel del Coronado include: George E. Conde, Mr. and Mrs. B. H. Bendheim, Fred A. Carrick, W. A. Beatty, C. A. Haight, A. W. du Brauf, Jay W. Adams, A. Goldstein and Miss McKenna.

Mrs. A. N. Towne and her daughter Mrs. Clinton E. Worden were at Del Monte last week with Mrs. W. D. Mansfield. Mrs. Towne and Mrs. Worden will make their home at the Fairmont this winter but intend to run down often to Del Monte for short visits or for the week-end.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward D. Tenny and their daughter Miss Wilhelmina Tenny, after spending several weeks at the Fairmont, sailed Wednesday for their home in Honolulu.

Mrs. William Ashe who is domiciled at the Palace since closing her country place, "Ten

Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Pierce of Pasadena who have been making a long visit at Del Monte left Sunday to continue their motor trip to San Francisco.

Mrs. Edgar Preston entertained at a children's party at the Fairmont during the week. The guests were Mrs. Preston's four grandchildren and little Miss Jeanette Norris, the daughter of Mrs. Frank Preston.

Henry Miller in "Her Husband's Wife"

By Edward F. O'Day

Mr. A. E. Thomas, the newspaperman who wrote "Her Husband's Wife" is richly endowed with imagination. The cynical may suggest that imagination is a commonplace characteristic of newspapermen, but it is of the dramatist that I am speaking and in his drama Mr. Thomas shows that he is exuberantly gifted in this particular. Nowhere does his imagination play so freely as in the happy ending which is essential to comedy. Mr. Thomas' happy ending is unique. It displays a husband coming home in a state of glorious intoxication and getting to bed without exciting the suspicion of his wife. A dramatist who can imagine a situation like that will go far in his profession. His fancy has broken the trammels that chain most of our playwrights to verisimilitude. He has embodied a situation that prefigures the coming of the millennium, for I make no doubt that when that wonderful era arrives husbands will be able to accomplish such seeming impossibilities. Up to the present moment, I believe, no husband has ever been able to do it. Intoxication, like murder, will out, particularly when it is brought into the domestic circle. But Mr. Thomas' happy ending is not the only exhibition of imagination in "Her Husband's Wife." The play is full of delicious situations which would strain credulity if we were expected to take them seriously. But we are not. Mr. Thomas has had the good fortune to write a comedy which does not have to be taken seriously. Therein it differs radically from a great many of the comedies to which we have been treated in the past season. Most of them have been very serious affairs indeed. To treat them lightly would be as great an affront as to speak disrespectfully of the equator or to warm a North Pole discussion with the glow of humor. They are a solemn lot, our writers of comedies, and they understand the responsibilities of their position. Most of them would not make us laugh for the world—perhaps they could not even if they would. But Mr. Thomas is an irresponsible playwright. He has approached his task with smiling gaiety and his good nature is infectious. The result is that he makes us laugh continually, makes us laugh almost as heartily as we do at some of the farces. But the difference is this; while we laugh and forget the farce, we laugh and remember "Her Husband's Wife" and that makes us laugh again. The play actually contains lines and situations which are worth remembering and it is no effort at all to remember them. If an effort were necessary it would be its own reward, for there are few things as priceless as laughter and few men so invaluable in the republic as those who can lubricate the stiff hinges of our laughing apparatus. This is a serious age and a serious nation. We have reached the well nigh incurable state of seriousness wherein we even take our politics seriously and, as I have remarked before, the spirit of the age is reflected in our writers of comedies. Comedies like "Her Husband's Wife" are almost as rare as good comedians. It is the happy fortune of Mr. Thomas that his comedy has fallen into the hands of good comedians. Mr. Miller is a fine comedian. He has a gift of spontaneous laughter and he laughs all through "Her Husband's Wife." Perhaps he overdoes it a little. The suspicion that he overdoes it forces itself on the mind once in a while but perhaps that suspicion is one of the evil results of our overpowering seriousness. Perhaps we are a little afraid of so much laughter, not being used to it. What a commentary on our parlous condition when we suspect that Mr. Miller takes his mirth a bit too frivolously! But that is one of the signs of a time which endures sad disquisitions on the joy of living and finds its happiness in melancholy bodings. Mr. Miller is mirthful himself and the cause why mirth is in others. Miss Laura Hope Crews causes mirth in others but is herself far from mirthful—in Mr. Thomas' comedy. She is the spirit of the age incarnate. She looks forward with sentimental joy to her own funeral and is never so happy as when she is perfectly miserable. A hypochondriac? Perhaps, but so are nearly all of us. 'Tis a hypochondriacal age. And yet there is a gleam of hope, for we dare to laugh at Miss Crews and laughter is the cure of hypochondria. Mr. Thomas has realized that as Mr. Barrie did when he wrote "What Every Woman Knows." But while Mr. Barrie showed us a woman laboring through four acts to make a man laugh and finally accomplishing her purpose, Mr. Thomas shows us a man laughing at a woman who to the end is uniformly serious. Let us hope that she will some day succumb to mirth. Perhaps when she discovers, as she must some day discover, the condition in which her husband came home—but alas! we are growing serious. The habit will persist, though Mr. Thomas has shaken it to its base. As the apostle of laughter he must continue his good work. Another play, Mr. Thomas, and another and another!

The Scotti-De Pasquali Concerts

Next Wednesday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co's the sale of seats for the concerts of Signor Antonio Scotti and Mme. Bernice de Pasquali will open and mail orders should be sent to that address. The first date is Sunday afternoon, October 16, at the Columbia. Scotti will be heard in the prologue from "I Pagliacci," the "Cavatina" from Faust and numbers from his greatest success, "Don Giovanni." Mme. Bernice de Pasquali's numbers will include a group of songs by Brahms, Di Aqua and Tosti, the brilliant "Polonaise" from "Mignon" and a group of old Irish songs. A specially interesting feature of the afternoon will be the singing of duets from "Don Giovanni" and "Barber of Seville" by the two artists. At the second concert, Thursday night, October 20, at the Novelty, Scotti will sing numbers from "Ballo en Maschera" and "Le Roi de Lahore" and a group of Italian ballads in addition tion to his parts in the duets from "Don Pasquale" and "Marriage of Figaro." Mme. de Pasquali's numbers will include songs by Richardson, Delibes and d'Hardelot, the "Ah fors e lui" from "La Traviata" and a group of old Scotch works. For the farewell concert at the Columbia Sunday afternoon, October 23, a special novelty and request program will be given.

"My Wife" at the Alcazar

After a three months' absence from the Alcazar stage Bessie Barriscale will reappear next Monday evening and throughout the week in "My Wife," the comedy that elevated Billie Burke to stardom. No better vehicle could have been selected for the occasion. In the role which Miss Burke originated Miss Barriscale will have opportunity to display her very best qualities. "My Wife," adapted from the French by Michael Morton, was serving John Drew as a starring medium when the work of Billie Burke in the role of Trixie Dupre threatened that clever actor's supremacy in the cast and enabled the young woman to attain the stellar position which she has since occupied. In the cast with Miss Barriscale is the cream of the Alcazar Company, including Thurston Hall, Burt Wesner, Louis Ben-nison, Will R. Walling, Thomas Chatterton, Howard Hickman, Grace Barbour and Adele Belgarde.

"The Witching Hour" at the Savoy

The last performance of that delightful musical comedy, "The Prince of Pilsen," will take place at the Savoy this Sunday evening and on Monday night that distinguished actor, John Mason, will begin an engagement limited to one week in Augustus Thomas' famous telepathic drama, "The Witching Hour." The play and its principal come surrounded by the same conditions in the matter of cast and scenic detail that figured in Mr. Mason's remarkable engagement in New York. The Messrs. Shubert promise that the production will be on the same elaborate style as when it was last seen here. The last performance will be given Sunday evening, October 16, and the usual popular priced matinee will take place on Thursday.

The Columbia Attractions

The second and last week of Mr. Miller's engagement in "Her Husband's Wife" begins Monday. There will be Wednesday and Saturday matinees. "Three Twins" with its "Yama Yama Man" and innumerable other song hits will be seen at the Columbia for two weeks commencing Monday, October 17. It was one of the most brilliant hits of last season in this city and returns with Victor Morley in the same role in which he appeared before.

Last Weeks of Bevani Opera Company

The recognition being extended to the Bevani Grand Opera Company at the Garrick is most enthusiastic and its popularity seems to increase with every performance. "Lucia" will be sung today's (Saturday) matinee with Vicarino, Sacchetti, Alberti and Bevani. The opera to-night (Saturday) will be "La Boheme" with Francini, Scherzer, Battain, Campana, Secci-Corsi, Giuliani and Bevani. "Faust" will be given tomorrow matinee with Frery, Jarman, Sacchetti, Alberti and Bevani. Tomorrow (Sunday) night "Rigoletto" will be repeated for the last time with a splendid cast which will include Vicarino, De Dreux, Battain, Campana and Bevani. Monday evening the last two weeks of the season will begin and the repertoire for next week is as follows: Monday night "Martha" (last time) with Francini, De Dreux, Sacchetti, Campana and Florian. Tuesday night (last time) of "The Love Tales of Hoffman" with Vicarino, De Dreux, Battain, Alberti and Florian. Wednesday night (last time) "Aida" with Frery, Jarman, Sacchetti, Campana and Bevani. Thursday night, the ninety-seventh anniversary of Italy's greatest composer, Verdi, will be celebrated by a special program consisting of acts from the great maestro's most celebrated works with the entire Bevani company in the casts. Signor Ettore Patrizi will make an address, the subject being "Verdi the Immortal" after which the second scene of the first act of "Il Trovatore" will be given with Frery, Newcombe, Secci-Corsi and Giuliani. The first act of "La Traviata" will be presented with Vicarino and Sacchetti. The third act of "Aida" will be an important feature of this splendid program with Frery, Jarman, Battain and Campana. The fourth act of "Rigoletto" with Francini, De Dreux, Sacchetti, Alberti and Bevani will conclude the program. The affair will be under the patronage of the Italian colony and is sure to be liberally patronized. Friday will most positively be the last night of "La Boheme." Regina Vicarino will be heard on this occasion only as Mimi.

Louise Meyers, Mildred Warren and Bert Lyon, a trio of musical comedy players with dancing ability, will appear in a one-act sketch called "A Little of Every-thing." The Six Abdallahs are a troupe of American acrobats who have been a feature at the New York Hippodrome. The Joseph Adelm-ann Family will contribute a musical act in two parts. It will also terminate the engagement of William Rock and Maude Fulton whose singing and terpsichorean act is one of the greatest hits in vaudeville.

Bal Masque at Idora
One week from Sunday will mark the close of the Idora Park season and for the winter months the big pleasure park across the bay will lay idle after the most successful season in its career. Ellery's final week of concerts promises to be a series of delightful programs. The event of the closing week will be the Panama-Pacific Bal Masque which will be held on the evening of October 14 in the mammoth pavilion. Ellery's Band will furnish the music and for many hours the masqueraders will revel in dancing and car-nival delights.

In the Limelight
Lillian Russell produced her new play entitled "In Search of a Sinner" at Chicago two weeks ago. Ashton Stevens said of the performance: "Charlotte Thompson has given her one of the best parts of her life, if not the part. In it Miss Russell will strike sparks in New York. Old critics may no longer say that Miss Russell is a promising young actress. They will have to cut out that 'promising.'"
A splendid concert by Lawrence Strauss, tenor, and Miss Edith Gere Kelley, pianist, will be given this Sunday afternoon, October 9, at Kohler and Chase Hall.
Mme. Johanna Gadski, the great Wagnerian and dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan and one of the most satisfactory singers on the concert platform, will appear at the Columbia, Sun-day afternoon, November 6.

An idea of the importance of the tour of the Imperial Russian Ballet from the Royal Opera House of St. Petersburg may be obtained from the statement of Count Centaniui, private secretary of Signor Gatti-Cazzaza, that the entire scenic equipment from the "Theatre du Chatelet" of Paris and Metropolitan Opera House, New York, will be sent along. With the company, be-sides the two famous stars, Mlle. Anna Pavlowa and Michael Mordkin, eight of the principal dancers of the Moscow and St. Petersburg government opera houses and twenty-four of the secondary dancers will be seen. The orchestral part will be furnished by forty-two players from the Met-ropolitan's forces under the direction of Theodore Stier of London and Vienna. Among the ballets to be given are "Copellia" and "The Arabian Nights."

His Bun Hard to Beat
"Ah," said the grey-haired wayfarer at the rail-way refreshment room, "this is the old place. I recognized yonder landmark at once."
"What landmark?" inquired the waitress, con-siderately.
"Years ago, when I traveled over this line," said the stranger, in a choking voice, "I carved my initials and the date on yonder bun. I see you have it still. Excuse an old man's tears."

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There is very little to note in the way of a change in the Wall Street situation at the close of the week. The end of the month has passed without money disturbance which is exceedingly satisfactory to the banking interests and the return of $170,000,000 of disbursements to regular channels again, money conditions should remain as heretofore. With the knowledge that the railroads will be given a square deal by the Government in the matter of raising freight and passenger rates, a much better feeling exists in the steel and iron outlook as railways will be in the market soon with very heavy orders for all classes of material and this means a distinct change for the better in the entire industrial world. The political situation which is now drawing to a focus has been watched keenly not only by banking people but the entire business community of the country. A marked feature of this coming election is the tremendous defections from the Republican ranks toward Democratic candidates in every quarter by business men in repudiation of Rooseveltism, etc. Leading bankers are now optimistic on the outlook and a general advance in all securities seems in order during the fall months.

Wheat—Marked weakness in wheat and a general discouragement of holders was seen last week. A little headway toward establishing an export level was made, but nothing in the way of sales was accomplished. There were some indications of a falling off in exports from Russia and the Danube, but nothing important or positive enough to give the trade much encouragement. Small improvements was seen in the milling demand for wheat here. Shipments out of Chicago last week were 84,000 bushels more than were received, against 18,000 bushels more shipped than received the preceding week. In view of the large stock in Chicago this is not a very good showing for the market which is admittedly the lowest in the country. Transportation facilities were good. Vessel room went a-begging a good part of the week on the basis of one cent per bushel for wheat to Buffalo. Ocean freights were as low as before, with plenty of room to be had at low figures. In the opinion of the local Chicago export concerns the United States has overstayed its market and missed its wheat export opportunity this year, and wheat must rely on domestic demand for most of its encouragement. Meanwhile the market is drifting lower. It has no leaders on the buying side and bears are gaing fresh courage with each new decline.

Corn—The export demand for North American corn has developed on a reasonably liberal scale in the last week. The fine weather has also made it reasonably sure that the great bulk of the new crop is safe from frost. The latter feature kept heavy selling pressure on the market, farmers' sales of old crop being much larger than expected at the lowest prices.

Cotton—The cotton market during the past week has practically reflected the sensational reports coming from nearly every section of the cotton belt and the outsider has just begun to awaken to the possibilities from a speculative standpoint on the long side of the market. The rains in Texas early last month were insufficient to make appreciable improvement and the plant over a large section of the State will be smaller than last year. Oklahoma showed magnificent prospects but they have been seriously impaired and our correspondents are reporting that the ragaces of the boll worm have assumed alarming proportions. Arkansas also has fallen back. Louisiana and Mississippi are now suffering from the boll weevil infection. The eastern States have not yet fully recovered from the damage in the early portion of the year by excessive rains. An added discouraging factor is the lateness of the plant by fully three weeks throughout the entire region. This precludes a late top crop which in some years has saved the country from a disastrous yield. Spot cotton at all southern ports continues in active demand at good prices although receipts are considered quite large. Exporters are in the market for cotton every day and clearances so far this season are equal to last year's exports. The lockout in Manchester became effective October 1 and about 700 mills are now idle. Notwithstanding this the Liverpool market has even advanced more rapidly than ours which would indicate an early settlement of labor troubles. The situation as we view it is decidedly bullish and barring natural setbacks warrants much higher prices.

Literal Obedience

"I can't keep the visitors from coming up," said an office boy dejectedly to the editor of a popular newspaper. "When I say you're out they don't believe me. They say they must see you."

"Well," said the editor, "just tell them that is what they all say. I must have quiet."

Shortly afterwards there called a lady who wanted to see the editor. The boy assured her that it was impossible.

"But I must see him!" she protested. "I'm his wife!"

"That's what they all say!" replied the lad. There is a vacancy for another office boy.

the world will reproach me, and I return with honors, millions and consideration. I have behaved in complete harmony with the most approved modern methods of business. You shall learn.

"With the thousand pesetas that I obtained from Ramon—and, by the way, what has become of Ramon?"

"He is very old and in virtue of his military service has been admitted to the Old Soldiers' Home."

"This afternoon I shall pay him a visit and make him a present of one or two thousand duros."

These words fell like a golden shower.

"For you, Manuel, I have set aside twenty thousand, and for you, Antonio and Jose, similar sums. Father, I bought for you yesterday a mansion on the Castellana, and we shall all live there together in royal style."

They no longer heard clearly, but simply gazed upon him as though he were some supernatural thing.

"Well, as I was saying, with those thousand pesetas and another thousand borrowed from a friend, I sailed for the United States, a country where money is plenty and principles are few. There I began looking for business—what is called business there is getting money out of other people's pockets—and I found employment in the offices of a great ship owner, a man of wealth and importance. At the end of six months I ran away with his wife."

"Heavens!" exclaimed the father.

"An affair of the heart, father, what the press of both hemispheres calls a 'drama of passion.' Everyone was on my side. The lady was young and beautiful; her husband was old and ailing.

Besides, he treated her badly. The newspapers published my photograph, that of my lady-love, and that of the old man, who shot himself soon after. I was the hero of the hour, and I went to California with the lady in question. She had brought me about half a million dollars, and in California he who has the most money is most admired. There I floated one of those companies that succeed the world over, a gold mine minus the gold."

"But that is deception!"

"It occurs every day, and the public which is so gullible takes up the shares as fast as they are issued. Later comes the crash. In prevision of that, I had put forward a manager, who assumed all responsibility, while I figured only as a salaried director. On the day of the catastrophe, the manager was taken to court, while I pretended I had been robbed like the rest. You need not laugh, Manuel. As a lawyer, you must know all about such things, and I venture to say that for a fee of ten thousand dollars you would have defended us. Then with the money gained by that speculation, for that is what they call it in these days, I went to Paris, where I lived in great style and became a French citizen."

"French!" exclaimed the father, again sitting up in bed. "My son, a French citizen! I cannot believe it!"

"But, father, do you not know that in Spain we have a most convenient law in that respect? We are the only people that provide for repentant patriots. According to Article 22 of the Civil Code, a Spaniard who has lost his citizenship may recover it by merely declaring that such is his intention in the presence of the town clerk of the place that he selects as his residence. I have already complied with the law and am as good a Spaniard as before, but my French citizenship made my fortune."

"You are a clever man," said Manuel.

"It is remarkable," said the others.

"Paris is a city enslaved by capital and capitalists," continued Dimas. "There I entered upon ventures of all sorts—disastrous adventures for others, but exceedingly profitable for me. The French are like children, easy to deceive. You remember what happened with the Panama affair, the gold mines of the Transvaal and all the rest of these schemes to catch gullible fish. In Paris one needs but money and rank in order to succeed, and as in that republican country there is still a mania for titles, I made a journey to Rome during my first summer, and I am, as you see, the Marquis of Sahagun. By virtue of my rank and the good dinners I gave, I soon had many friends and followers. Ere long I was master of the situation. An inventor, penniless as all inventors are, came to me to get capital to put his invention on the market. I stole the idea for myself and it has made me rich."

"For the love of God!"

"Do you not know that the one who produces, invents or creates never gets the profits? The author is the prey of the editor, the actor of the manager, and the inventor of the capitalist. Capital! I represent capital, and the whole world bows before me. I had then gained all I wanted. Millions flowed in like water. Crosses, decorations, honors, I received them from all over the world. Moreover there are agencies where they can be bought.

"In fine, here I am, forty-six years old, called the 'opulent banker,' the 'great financier,' 'the philanthropist,' for I have given a few thousand francs to the poor. Next I shall build here a hospital, a school or anything that is needed.

"Tomorrow, father, you are to come and take possession of the new house. All the lower floor will be yours. The others will accommodate my brothers and their families. Each of them will have an ample account at the bank, while as for me, I shall have myself made a representative of the people, a senator or a minister. I shall help make the laws for the nation!"

They all laughed heartily. They were so elated by this unexpected shower of gold that the father, though half paralyzed, rose from his bed. Manuel hastened away to inform the community. Antonio sang songs of love and adventure as he busied himself about the departure. Jose planned the details of an immense commercial establishment that he intended to build in the very centre of Madrid. Dimas, too, was laughing, happy to see them happy. When finally he left the house, he remarked to a beggar who insisted upon holding open the door of his carriage:

"Go to work! Go to work! I have worked all my life."

Meanwhile his dear family kept repeating:

A Straight Tip

One day, while riding down town together on a subway train, a clergyman and a publisher fell to discussing the big sales and merits of the latest novels put on the market. One of them had just been reading to the other a magazine synopsis of the sales in different cities. Just at this moment a breezy, sporty looking individual entered the car and took a seat immediately behind them.

The clergyman was making the point that the best novels were not the ones that had the biggest sales and the publisher was trying to show him that he was at fault.

"Now, here," observed the publisher, "we find 'Arsene Lupin' first, 'Katrine' second, 'Mr. Opp,' third. Then, too—"

"I beg your pardon for buttin' in, gents," hurriedly interrupted the sport in the rear, "but I've followed this game for a good many years an' naturally I know what I'm talkin' about. That dope sheet you hold must be a fake. There ain't no such horses runnin', take it from me!"

The clergyman gave up the argument.

Simple Treatment

"I want you to take care of my practice while I'm away."

"But, doctor, I have just graduated. Have had little experience."

"You don't need it with my fashionable patients. Find out what they have been eating and change it. Find out where they have been summering and send 'em somewhere else."

"A tour that will be ranked among the most extensive ever made by auto is that started upon by Mrs. Amy K. de Ponvert who left San Francisco en route for the Atlantic sea board. Auto Notes

The biggest feature of the week in automobile row is the monster Morgan & Wright Nobby Tread Tire which created a sensation in Detroit during the recent Elks Convention there. This tire which is now on display at Weinstock-Nichols is 96x12 standard measurement and is of sufficient diameter to allow a man to stand inside the rim. It is accurately modeled after the regular Nobby Tread design and because of its magnitude emphasizes the anti-skid properties of this tire and the common sense principle by which these properties were obtained.

Fred Wagner who is driving the Auburn car on the transcontinental tour from San Francisco to New York, dropped a line to Frank Carroll of the Pacific Coast office of the New York Lubricating Oil Co. to the effect that he had reached Ely without one mishap or adjustment. He also added that Monogram Oil was proving a perfect lubricant for the machine.

Lee Ijams of the Diamond Rubber Company and J. W. Whitehead have just returned from a 1000 mile hunting trip made in Whitehead's Buick car.

Wallace C. Hood, sales manager of the Chalmers Motor Car Co. and one of the most widely known of the eastern automobile men, recently started on an extensive tour of the middle west and west in the interest of the Chalmers' selling organization. The trip which will last between two and three months includes San Francisco.

The Hupp Motor Car Company have just authorized S. G. Chapman to guarantee all Hupmobiles for life against all defects in material or workmanship on parts returned to the factory, charges prepaid, for inspection.

C. A. Hawkins, Pacific Coast manager of the White Company, has just received word of a remarkable tour made by W. D. Sleep of Portland in a White Gasoline car. The route lay from Portland to Vancouver and return with numerous side trips in addition. The distance totaled 1,015 miles. No car repairs were necessary during the trip.

E. Le Roy Pelletier, the well known automobile advertising man who is touring Europe in a Lozier car, writes from Switzerland that he has been traveling throughout the Alps and taking grades too steep for the majority of European cars. Besides sizing up the motor car situation Pelletier has been giving some attention to aerial navigation, having made flights in both a dirigible balloon and an aeroplane.

No one detail of the equipment of the Lozier car which Mulford drove in the Vanderbilt Race was more jealously guarded than the official stamps of the A. A. A. Technical Committee placed upon the car at Elgin, Ill. These stamps are a guarantee that the car is a bona fide stock chassis and as the Vanderbilt Race is not a stock car event, the good performance of a stock chassis in open competition is doubly creditable.

The most remarkable tire service recorded for the recent Milwaukee Sentinel's Reliability Run was that made by the Diamonds which equipped the Pierce-Racine driven by Strong and the Corbin driven by Bird. In both instances the long 900 mile grind was made on the twenty-two and one-half mile schedule without the tires being as much as pumped up.

Letters

The Greatest Wish in the World

It is an oddly assorted household to which E. Temple Thurston introduces his readers in "The Greatest Wish in the World," an Irish priest preying over a poor London parish, his English housekeeper, a childless widow grown old in his service, and Peggy Bannister, a waif left in the church when she was but two weeks old, with no clue to her identity save a letter in which her mother refers to her as "little Peggy" and in an ancient and faded sampler, the work of one Sarah Bannister, completed a hundred years before the little foundling saw the light. Father O'Leary was not book-learned. His speech was adorned with a rich brogue and embroidered with colloquialisms and quaint turns, and Mrs. Parfitt, equally unlettered, had the cockney disregard for her aspirates. Sometimes the brogue and the cockneyisms were quaintly blended, too, and other things besides their speech. Mrs. Parfitt was inclined to domineer over the good man and to assert her authority in household matters but in whatever else they differed in one thing they were a unit, for both fell instantly in love with the baby left on their hands and instead of consigning it to an orphanage the good father placed the little girl in the care of a worthy market woman not far outside the city limits, where he was able to visit her often and where he became "Daddy O'Leary" as naturally as Mrs. Parfitt was transformed into "Mummy," and despite the five years of care on the part of the worthy Gooseberrys, when the little girl was given her choice of a permanent home she promptly decided on the presbytery in London and the good "Daddy" who knew innumerable tales of "little people," rhymes and folk songs and was never at a loss for a satisfactory answer to her childish questionings. Doubtless the good priest's "dainties," when questioned too closely upon vital subjects will shock the modern advocates of the "tell it all policy," but at any rate little Peggy preserved her innocence until she was quite grown up and came through her ordeals a clean, wholesome, sensible girl. Enter of course, the lover, a sailor home from the seas and temporarily ensconced in a garret chamber across the court, a clean minded youth almost as unsophisticated as the girl. Exit also, for a story without a pair of lovers with difficulties to surmount and absence to live through is no story at all. Steven Gale then dropped out of sight almost as unceremoniously as he appeared and after a year of unexplained silence nothing must do the abandoned Peggy but that she shall immure herself behind convent walls. She is quite convinced that she has a vocation and as nothing in the way of argument will alter her conviction she must be let take her course. Poor Father O'Leary is as nearly heartbroken as a priest may allow himself to become, for Peggy was to all intents and purposes his daughter and in acquiescing to her resolution he was living again the sorrow of his own life. The priesthood was for him a second choice for the only girl he had ever loved had developed a vocation for a religious life and was now the Mother Superior of a Convent of Mercy. To her care Peggy was assigned with a letter begging her to defer as long as possible the formal acceptance of the postulant in order that she might fully make up her mind before committing herself. But Peggy showed no wavering inclination and after nearly a month of residence within the walls and constant importunities, the date was set, within a few days. Then came the eleventh-hour miracle, the return of the lover and the rather commonplace explanation of a purloined letter, a hasty setting sail, a wreck and a long exile before a chance steamer, putting in for water, rescued the shipwrecked mariners. To those who are in the habit of regarding convents much in the light of medieval prisons in which young girls are immured against their wills and kept under lock and key and close surveillance, the negative agreement of Father O'Leary will come as a surprise, as will the existence of the door out into the world which any of the sisterhood may open if she desires to, but the truth is that the church recognizes the religious life as one which demands an unquestioned vocation and no one may be forced into it or held for a moment against her will. All that is demanded is compliance with the rules while one remains and though a postulant—a novice—enters on a probationary period to test the life she is herself just as much on trial. If she is satisfied that conventual existence is not for her, or if the conventual authorities decide that for any reason she is not fitted for the life, she leaves the institution without prejudice. The story ends as it begins, with the advent of a little child, and the benediction of the good priest when the Greatest Wish in the World has been granted but between these events there is an abundance of humor as well as pathos and oftentimes it is difficult to say which of them is uppermost. Mitchell Kennerley is the sponsor for this latest production of the pen of E. Temple Thurston

A Vigorous Old Writer

Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, now well on in the eighty-second year of his age, will have a new novel published in the autumn. He is probably the oldest story teller writing in the English language and though he has a long list of books to his credit, fiction, poetry and professional, he did not begin to write until he had passed the half century mark. Dr. Mitchell does not regard writing as "work," however, and it is only during his short summer vacations that he has turned to his pen as a recreation. His specialty is diseases of the nerves and once, while in Vienna he had a singular experience. He had occasion to consult one of the famous Austrian specialists who, not recognizing his visitor, after learning that he was an American, enquired why he had not while at home consulted the highest authority. Dr. Mitchell inquired who this was, and, to his surprise, was told "Dr. S. Weir Mitchell of Philadelphia." Dr. Mitchell's son is also a physician. On one occasion, when the younger doctor was recovering from a severe illness, his father undertook the care of his patients, moving to the son's office. Amongst those who presented themselves was a wealthy skinflint who desired the best of skill for the least of payment. An operation was to be performed on his wife and he took advantage of the opportunity to pose as a poor man. The operation was performed and the bill made out at the rate charged by the junior, about one-fourth what Dr. Mitchell would have asked one of his own patients, but Mr. Skinflint, so far from being satisfied, had the hardihood to ask a reduction of ten per cent for cash. The offer being refused, he left the office advising the doctor to "think it over." Dr. Mitchell was the originator of the "rest cure." He might also be said to have originated the historical novel of the colonial and revolutionary period, for his "Hugh Wynne, Free Quaker" antedated "Janice Meredith" by several years and was so much better that it is small wonder it is never mentioned in the same class.

Thousand Oaks

Berkeley

Would 300% profit interest you?

Thousand Oaks villa homesites are being offered right now at $25 to $35 a front foot, and on terms of 10 per cent down and 1 per cent a month, with no interest on taxes for two years. By the time you have made eight or ten payments the electric tram will be running and if you wish to sell you can do so at a handsome profit.

Discriminating people who bought in advance of the Key Route lines made money. In high class residence property Piedmont and Claremont have netted investors 300 per cent. Yet today not even the best up residence sections of Oakland near Berkeley have the transportation facilities which Thousand Oaks will have March 1st, when the Southern Pacific's electric lines are in operation.

Values will rise more rapidly in Thousand Oaks than they did in either Piedmont or Claremont because of the unparallelled railway service going into this new subdivision.

The new $25,000 station will be five minutes walk through a high class residence district. At this station one can obtain every 7 or 8 minutes over a choice of 3 different routes and reach San Francisco in 35 minutes.

Think this over. You have missed opportunities to make money in transbay real estate. Don't let this, the best investment of them all, go by. Go out and see this beautiful property, and see what the Southern Pacific is doing. Then you will understand why the property is selling so rapidly.

See Thousand Oaks at once. And in the meantime phone or write for illustrated booklet.

A Disquieting Phenomenon

We note with a keen sense of misgiving, nay, with grave apprehension and distrust, the overtures being made from day to day to certain practical and irreclaimable politicians by the duly authorized agents of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League candidate for governor. In no querulous spirit do we breathe the suspicion that agitates our breast. Our purpose is to admonish, not to rebuke. Having been led to suppose that the Hon. Hiram Johnson entered the gubernatorial contest for the righteous purpose of putting the quietus on the Octopus; having been assured that there could be no compromise, that the forces of corruption were beyond the pale and must remain there, it is impossible to view complacently the gradual assimilation of elements that bear the indelible brand of the unspeakable special interests. How can octophobia bark exultingly in circumstances such as these to which we reluctantly give hint? Harmony cannot be revived in the Republican party in this State at this time without rendering the conclusion imperative that the Hon. Grove L. Johnson has succeeded in doing what many of his son's followers have reckoned among the dread possibilities of the fall season. Of course it is not to be said that the Republicans have been harmonized. It is beyond human power to extinguish all the rancor that pervades Republican ranks. But patent to all that read the daily papers is the disquieting fact that while the Octopus is getting from Hiram the worst tongue-lashing of its infamous career it has no reason to feel in the slightest degree uncomfortable.

On Roosevelt's Trail

History may tell us that the twentieth century Battle of Saratoga was one of the decisive battles in national politics at which the hero, given a choice between Victory and Westminster Abbey, gained the glory of one by embracing the other. For now it is beginning to appear that Colonel Roosevelt unlike the hero to whom he has been likened made the journey to Moscow after instead of before the trip to Elba. 'Twas a famous victory, but of the kind by which the hero is undone. The Colonel triumphed, but his army has deserted. From all those sections of the country where the insurgents are entrenched come reports of the repudiation of the ex-President by men that once were pleased to parade their allegiance and devotion. Among insurgents generally the sentiment prevails that at Saratoga Colonel Roosevelt forfeited principle for personal advantage. Of course this is precisely what he did, but in so doing it cannot be said that he stultified himself. An exclusive solicitude for self always has been the Colonel's most luminous characteristic. His conception of the proper way of advancing the greater good is to make an idol of his self-interest and a martyr of his integrity. Projecting the central shadow of his household god, which is himself, on everything around him, the nation has been haunted by him, but lo! the bells have been rung for the solemn ceremony of adjuration. Hark to the chorus of insurgents in corybantic incantation. The exorcism is on. The keynote we get from the Des Moines News, the personal organ of Senator Cummins. Says the News: "Roosevelt bringing with him Taft, Ballinger, Wickersham, Root, J. P. Morgan, Tawney, Lurton, Hitchcock and all the motley crew of plutocrats, the Hesians of privilege cannot enlist in the army of insurgency." From the Des Moines Leader comes the loud refrain, "Roosevelt's room is far preferable to his company." And all and sundry, the organs of insurgency are swelling the chorus, telling us that Teddy has become intolerable, and merely because he surrendered to the standpatters in the hope of getting control of the New York delegation to the national convention in 1912. Yet in all the land there is not a standpatter so humble as to do him reverence; not one that does not view his predicament with elation. Al! now realize that what Taft did for him at Saratoga was about the worst thing that could have been done. He supplied the insurgents with a pretext to swat the Colonel and abandon him. Of their eagerness for this pretext we have not been unaware. Though far removed from the hotbed of national politics the important turn that affairs have taken we have been looking forward to for some months. Adumbrations of it we perceived, hints of it we received, from the most reliable sources. The truth is that among the insurgents are several men that aspire to the presidency. They have long nursed a secret hostility to Roosevelt, believing him to be an obstacle in their pathway to power. It is because of this keen rivalry among the leading demagogues of the country that we have been having so much mischievous political agitation, so much competition in the business of devising new principles, new schemes of innovation calculated to win the favor of the hysterical mob.

Our Recreant Employers

Now that a big convention has been called to urge Congress to keep a fleet of battleships in Pacific waters some heed should be given to certain pertinent criticism uttered a few weeks ago by the Army and Navy Journal with reference to the attitude of employers on the Pacific Coast toward the Organized Militia. Army officers have been complaining that members of the militia are not permitted to go to encampments. At a recent encampment held in San Diego only about fifty per cent of the militia company reported for duty in a circumstance, due says Major-General Gatchell, U. S. A., "not to lack of desire to attend, but to the necessity of remaining at work to retain their positions." And adds, "The employer has no eye for future troubles. He cannot see beyond the present accumulation of profit." The Army and Navy Journal regards it as almost incredible that such a statement should be made about business men on the Pacific Coast. The editor reminds us that Representative McLachlan "has been thundering in the halls of Congress about the defenselessness of the Pacific Coast," and he is greatly indignant that this recreancy should be found in California "which only a few months ago was on the point of embroiling the whole country in a bitter controversy with Japan." He thinks that California should be ashamed of herself, and he asks "How can that State properly come before Congress now with a demand that a large fleet be stationed in the Pacific when she shows herself so remiss in her own duty? This is a question that should be discussed in the Pacific Coast Congress which has been called chiefly as a result of the enthusiasm of Senator Wright of San Diego that beautiful county in which the militia spirit has gone fast asleep amid the detonations of fair boomers and all the noises that betoken a great commercial awakening. Before addressing our statesmen in Washington on the subject of coast defenses we ought to vindicate our willingness to do something for ourselves. As the editor of the Army and Navy Journal shrewdly observes we have a sentiment to work up at home just as valuable to us in a way as the feeling we are seeking to develop in Congress. If our merchants are eager for the commercial benefits to be derived from navy in Pacific waters, the benefits that accrue from increase of business, they should first endeavor to show that what they are primarily interested in is protection from a foreign foe; and this they can do only by evincing some enthusiasm for the joint army and militia coast defense exercises.

The Immorality of Trade

The Examiner tells us that "the meanest thief on earth is the thief who steals by the use of false weights and measures." This class according to the Examiner comprises the coal dealer, grocer and butcher who have lying scales, the milkman who cheats with his bottles and the truck gardener who uses bushel measures with false bottoms. This is by no means a complete list. There is unscrupulous mendacity through all the ramifications of trade. It has been ever thus, and we doubt that it will ever be otherwise. The humble butcher who cheats his customers is no worse than the pompous retail dry-goods merchant who defrauds by means of fake bargain sales or the wholesale merchant who sells a piece of calico nominally thirty-six yards long that never measures more than thirty-one yards. Trickery in trade is universal, and even in the intellectual professions there is much quackery and cheating. Herbert Spencer, after making an exhaustive study of the morals of trade, and familiarizing himself with practices in which there had come to be general acquiescence in commercial life declared, "On all sides we have found the result of long personal experience to be the conviction that trade is essentially corrupt." He asserted that success in trade was incompatible with integrity, and that as the law of the universal world is eat and be eaten, the law of the commercial world is cheat and be cheated. Spencer was no nuckraker. He was devoted to conscientious scientific inquiry. He supported his indictment with facts and figures. The reflections which this indictment inspires are of a most melancholy sort. If there is so much cheating in the world then what a prodigious amount of hypocrisy there must be also? For the men that cheat in trade are the men that are demanding the improvement of morals in public life, and that are shocked and outraged by the misconduct of public servants. Yet to these men we must look for the refining of public sentiment. From commercial life we recruit the ranks of our reformers. The leading citizens of every community are the most successful men in trade, and trade we are told is utterly demoralizing. Nevertheless let us not be pessimistic. Let us rather become more tolerant of one another. We may practice forbearance toward our fellow-sinners without abating one jot or tittle of the hatred that we feel for those unspeakable sins to which none of us is ever inclined—the sins of our neighbor.

The Overthrowing of Governments

Lovers of democracy the world over believe that the people of Portugal are to be congratulated on their triumph over the principles of monarchy. The Portuguese themselves believing that a republic is a blessing are delighted for the present. In Lisbon all goes merrily on. The high born are down; the low born are up; Jack for the moment is as good as the Duke; Liberty, equality and fraternity are established; selfishness has been put out by an universal extinguisher; patriotism animates all hearts; a political millennium has been reached by one sanguinary effort in a single day. Happy citizens, redeemed from despotism, walk about the streets felicitating themselves on having seized the reins of government, while a monarch who had been lulled to repose in the lap of pleasure presents a melancholy figure far from the seat of inherited empire, an exile in foreign parts. We have witnessed only the first act in this stirring drama. There are other acts to come. Blood of innocent men has been shed, the lives of the unoffending have been sacrificed, presumably the interests of society have been advanced, but the consequences are yet to be felt. Too often the lightning that purifies the atmosphere proves more of a curse than a blessing. More than once Liberty with a shriek has quitted foul soil stained with innocent blood. The moral lesson comes after the tragedy. Who can forget the vicious circle of anarchy, bloodshed, Caesarism and foreign war which had its origin in the first revolution that broke up the institutions of France and gave her nothing in their place? Charles X, Louis Philippe, the Republic, the Empire, the Republic again are links in a chain which for eighty years no human statesmanship could break. Revolutionary incidents moved on in geometric procession, becoming so frequent that the overthrow of a constitution with its attendant bloodshed and lawlessness almost ceased to be a crime in public estimation, and France today instead of showing signs of recovery from the enervating strife affords nothing but evidence of a wasting disease. If any lesson is to be learnt from the French Revolution it is the vanity of doctrinaires and the folly of philosophers, who, not content with laying their hands on the mysteries of religion turn men aside from the practical reforms to which they are inclined to a region of nebulous illusions. We have no enthusiasm for revolutions such as the one that has occurred in Portugal, because we know that man, capable of nothing but incessant repetitions, moves in a circle beyond which all attempts at improvement are fruitless. The vindication of this proposition is to be found in the history of revolutions even if we go as far back as the train of them that desolated Greece in the heyday of her glory. We are told that if the French Revolution did not directly benefit France, it was at least of great benefit to society in general on account of the principles that it seemed to inculcate. As a matter of fact it was responsible for the one great evil of modern times—the immense standing army. When the old Gallican liberties and the lights of which France was one justly proud went out in the darkness of demagoguery she bequeathed to Europe the conscription, the gigantic wars that flow from it and the spirit in which they are carried on. And perhaps it may be truly said that the French Revolution revived in the modern world the spirit of unrest which tormented the peoples of the ancient world, and which even now is distracting the nations of the earth. Revolutions have always proceeded from the same causes. Whenever a people becomes preoccupied with the demoralizing game of politics it is ripe for revolution. Hence it is that revolutions are to be predicted with mathematical precision, with the same certainty with which Rousseau predicted the French Revolution. The harbingers of revolutions are the philosophers who weaken faith in religion, and teach men that there is no such thing as celestial vengeance. As the philosophers of Greece undermined the whole sacerdotal system of the nation and plunged the people into political strife, so did the Encyclopedists of France, and so did the Atheists of Portugal who preach Socialism as the only religion worthy the study of intellectual men. The truth is that when men became sceptical in religion they begin to have political doubts. Whoever searches into the groundwork of his faith finds himself in the mood to inquire into the principles of government which all men believe they can apprehend, but which are comprehensible only to the few. For some years the people of Portugal have been preoccupied with religion and politics, a misfortune for which the church is partly responsible by reason of the fact that it has not confined its activities to spiritual affairs. This circumstance the Socialists have employed for the purposes of their propaganda, hating as they do the Church of Rome because of its allegiance to established government and its devotion to the principle of property rights. So engrossed have the Portuguese been with politics that cities of less than seven thousand inhabitants have seven or eight political journals whose main business is to excel one another in stimulating class hatred and exciting bigotry, envy and malice. The country abounds in demagogues who have been exploiting the peoples' concern for the prosperity of the fatherland. Today there is but one faith in Portugal and Braga is its prophet. Braga, the scholar, is to the Portuguese today what Lamartine was to the French of 1848—the favorite child of the revolution, his country's idol. The next act may reveal him as an entirely different figure, as it may also reveal to us that the old monarchical vices, bribery, corruption and intimidation, are easily converted into republican virtues with the usual result—agitation for restoration. When men are preoccupied with politics they are easily persuaded that whatever form of government they are living under is the worst. To murmur at the powers that be, to lament the past, to conceive extravagant hopes of the future—these are dispositions common to mankind to which the demagogue never appeals in vain. When the floodgates of revolution are opened it flows apace and no man can limit its extent or force. The troubles of Portugal began with the fall of a dynasty.

Did Bacon Write Them?

A Case Made Out Without the Use of a Cipher But With the Aid of a Few Sentiments on the Subject of Love

By Theodore Bonnet

The Baconian theory has taken a fresh hold on the attention of pedants. This time we are told that the case against the immortal bard is proved beyond peradventure. Of course it is proved in the old familiar way, but now the evidence, we are assured, is absolutely irrefutable. Such is the dictum of Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart, B. A., L. L. B., etc., who has written a book—"Bacon is Shake-speare." The title seems to settle the question if nothing else does. Sir Edwin bears all the marks of the true pedantic character—bigoted attachment to a pet subject, narrow vision that prevents him from seeing all sides, and pride in being wrong by rules. He tells us that "England is now declining any longer to dishonor and defame the greatest genius of all time by continuing to identify him with the mean, drunken, ignorant and absolutely unlettered rustic of Stratford." Sir Edwin proves his case with ciphers like all the Baconian fanatics, and apparently in blissful ignorance of the fact that nobody afflicted with the cipher habit is ever at a loss for convincing combinations of letters.

These miserable long-eared twaddlers that are eternally braying about the authorship of the Shakespearean plays remind me of the answer made by Lord Beaconsfield to the ingenuous youth who asked him for a little practical advice by the aid of which he might apprehend the secret of success in life. "Never trouble yourself," said the political sage, "about the Man in the Iron Mask and never get into a discussion about the authorship of the Letters of Junius." Doubtless to do either, in Beaconsfield's opinion, was to become an intolerable bore and thus render success in life more than ordinarily difficult. It occurs to me that the same is true respecting the man who devotes himself to the futility of sustaining the Baconian hypothesis.

It is much easier to prove that the Shakespearean plays were not written by Bacon than to prove that they were not written by Shakespeare. For we know Bacon, and we don't know the Stratford rustic except in so far as we suppose him to be revealed to us in his works. Knowing Bacon full well we know that he never could have written the plays. If a cipher could be found in every act of every play informing us that Bacon was the author the thing would be incredible. It would be easier to believe it to be a characteristic bit of Shakespearean tomfoolery than to take it seriously. Between Bacon and the author of the plays there was nothing in common in character or temperament. Of this we may be as certain as though they were our contemporaries and we were mingling today in the society of the Mermaid, and hobnobbing with the habitués of Eastcheap or the professional lights of Gray's Inn. One is distinctly and essentially a poet while the other is by temperament and nature a philosopher; the one draws inspiration from the depth of his own fancy; the other from his library. Their habits and manners are as dissimilar as those of the recluse and the man of the world. Anybody may know the facts of the dramatist's life by reading him. It is obvious that he has mixed with unnumbered kinds of men; that he has had various commerce with, and experience of, men. With half an eye one can see that he has had an enormous specific acquaintance with the common people, and that he has capacity for musing solitude as well as genius for observing mankind. He has sat down by the fireside of the peasant and heard the auld wife's tale. He has shared in the glorious hazards of the fox hunt. Like Moliere he has breathed the atmosphere of the stage, and he knows the feelings and aspirations of the lowliest workman behind the scenes. He has had love affairs, many of them. He has had opportunities for studying woman in all her moods and tenses, and the study was a labor of love.

Now it isn't necessary for Bacon to tell us that he's a closet philosopher. His performances are conclusive of that. Nor need he tell us that he has never been able to cultivate a fellow-feeling for the lowly, or that he always preferred metaphysical speculation to experience of men in all the walks of life. It is evident that he is as austere as Shakespeare is companionable. One knows that his sides never shook with laughter. And so one knows that while a Bacon might conceive an Iago, one is certain that he never could create a Falstaff. Aside from the lack of levity in his disposition, he was too much of a high-brow to write down to the level of the groundlings.

Bacon, his admirers tell us, is a poet. Granted. His prose is full of poetry, but his poetry is mainly prose. He managed the mechanics of verse not much better than a school-boy, and when hampered by the rules of prosody his poverty of thought was pitiable. Here is a sample of Bacon's verse on a theme which Shakespeare elaborated in the famous speech of John of Gaunt in Richard II:

Seated between the old world and the new,
A land there is no other land may touch,
Where reigns a Queen in peace and honor true;
Stories or fables do describe no such.
Never did Atlas such a burden bear,
As she in holding up the world opprest;
Supplying with her virtue everywhere
Weakness of friends, errors of servants best.
No nation breeds a warmer blood for war,
And yet she calms them by her majesty;
No age ever had wits refined so far,
And yet she calms them by her policy.
To her thy son must make his sacrifice
If he will have the morning of his eyes.

Shakespeare is frequently given to nodding. He wrote mediocre verse at times, but never anything quite so inane, so abounding in artificialities as the foregoing. The pedants that depend on ciphers to prove that Bacon is the immortal bard seem to be wholly ignorant of the fact that the man stands revealed in his diction. A man's style is conformable with his character. "The style is the man" was not said of clothes, but of the dress of thoughts. There is as much individuality in the manner of a writer as there is in chirography. Bacon's manner in all his writings is distinctive, and there is no trace of his manner in the Shakespearean plays. Nor is there any trace of the Shakespearean manner in the Baconian verse. It has none of the freedom and flexibility to be found in the plays; the motion is never fluent, friction is apparent, awkwardness mars, nimbleness is never in evidence.

But in all probability the cipher artisans have no sense of style. To them manner may not bespeak the man. Then what about that intellectualized emotion called sentiment? Surely the essential difference between Shakespeare and Bacon is to be perceived by listening to what they have to say. They have discoursed on almost every subject under the sun, and seldom do their views coincide. Perhaps on no subject do they more widely differ than that of woman. The author of Venus and Adonis was always the lover "sighing like furnace." If the fairest of beauty's daughters passed in review before Bacon to none would he throw a flower. Let us interrogate them on the subject of love. Sir Francis makes reply that one should love only himself. He never loved another. He warns us all against love. "Love," he says, "loseth not only other things but itself." Again: "Whoso ever esteemeth too much of amorous affection quitteth both riches and wisdom." He tells us that great men and worthy have never been transported to a mad degree by love. He pronounces love the child of folly and declares that it should be severed from our serious affairs. Indeed he goes so far as to affirm that no man can be true to his own ends and be in love. Can't you almost hear these words as they fall from the lips of the ambitious, selfish, gold-worshipping philosopher who married for money in his old age? Can you see anything of romance of playful fancy beneath the skin of the cold-blooded misogynist who gave utterance to such sentiments? Imagine him, if you can, writing "A Midsummer Night's Dream," or "Romeo and Juliet." Bacon knew of only three kinds of love—nuptial, the love of friends and wanton love. In his set essay on love he never alluded to maternal love.

Now let us consult Falstaff's friend and see what he has to say about love. He is positively garrulous on the subject. It seems to be his hobby. Asked if it is true as Bacon says that great men never fall in love he answers that it "inhabits in the finest wits of all." Does he ever warn us against love? Nay, on the contrary, he tells us that there is nothing better than love. He says that it "comforteth like sunshine after rain"; that it comforts in sorrow; that it surfeits not; that it gives nobility of character even to base men. He considers love more to be desired than high birth or wealth. "Love sought is good," he says, "but given unsought is better." He has known things base and vile transposed by love to form and dignity. He assures us that when Love speaks the voice of all the gods makes Heaven drowsy with its harmony. Self was Bacon's idol. "Love thyself last," says Shakespeare. And what of maternal love? Shakespeare knew of it:

"I have given suck and know How tender 'tis to love the babe that milks me."

Does anybody care for a cipher? I am content to rest the case on the testimony thus far adduced. If anybody wants more let him take the essays and compare the sentiments in any one of them with the sentiments to be found in the plays.

Doctored News From Lisbon

Editor Town Talk, Sir: Though it is admitted that the news from Lisbon these days comes through the hands of the Revolutionists and though apparently it is all designed to influence public opinion abroad our newspapers are presenting it as though it were of the most authentic nature. Now anybody who has kept in touch with the situation in Portugal through the leading European newspapers knows that the current despatches are anything but reliable. Put even on the face of them there is evidence of misrepresentation. Take for example the statement that the clergy are the aggressors in the disturbances that have occurred. How absurd to charge the clergy with leading assaults on the soldiers after the army took possession of the city. The truth undoubtedly is that the soldiers and the mob have been committing all sorts of depredations, and that the priest have been murdered in cold-blood by the looters. This I say is undoubtedly the truth, because we know that such was the case in France during the Revolution and because we know that a score or so of priests in a monastery would not be so foolish as to attack the armed mob and the riotous soldiery. That they have been charged with so doing warrants the inference that they have been subjected to great cruelty and brutality, and that the Revolutionists in anticipation of criticism have deemed it advisable to put the blame on them. Later on when order is restored we shall know the truth. We shall learn of the wanton destruction of life and property and of all the crimes that have been committed in the name of liberty. Meanwhile the clericals must be denounced and we must be regaled on the old familiar stories of underground chambers and secret tunnels and cellars full of wine. These medieval tales must persist through the centuries. Whenever the church is attacked the secret tunnel story is put in circulation. Even here in San Francisco during the A. P. A. agitation it was said that there were tunnels under the old Jesuit Church and subterranean chambers filled with gold. Has anybody explored those tunnels since the fire? The lot at Hayes and Van Ness has been vacant a long time, but the tunnels appear to have been filled up.

Johnson's Human Republicanism

Editor Town Talk, Sir: Mr. Johnson came to town the other day and told us about the new Republicanism. He calls it "Human Republicanism," and he says that it exalts the human being, putting him above the dollar. Now is this not the most salient principle in Mr. Johnson's everyday creed? I ask you because I think you have kept tab on him in your city. Did he not exalt himself above the dollar when he was fighting against civic corruption at so much per diem while thumping his brisket and pointing with pride to his disinterested patriotism? And again didn't he exalt Dalzell Brown above the dollar; in fact, above many dollars, the dollars that were stolen from the depositors of the California Safe Deposit Bank? I love to see a man true to his principles. In this degenerate day and generation there are not many men that practice what they preach so zealously as this criminal lawyer who defends abortionists and bank looters and tries to win will contests by seeking to intimidate women. What a splendid figure this great reformer, who has been sponsored by the immaculate Pinchot and the divine Roosevelt, would cut as Governor of our glorious State.

The Shocking of Hearst

Editor Town Talk, Sir: From the Examiner I learn that the most significant recent event in the field of national economics is the alliance struck between railroad managers and organized railroad workers in a common demand for higher freight rates. The Examiner very properly regards this as a combination of capital and labor against the people, and quite pertinently asks "who will stand up for the public?" Echo answers Who? Certainly not Mr. Hearst. He has been standing up for the plain people for a long time and also for organized labor, and the combination of which he now complains is the logical outcome of the philosophy that he has been preaching. This is supposed to be a government of the people for the benefit of the public, but Mr. Hearst and many agitators of his kidney have long seen fit to advocate government for classes. Mr. Hearst is the zealous friend of the class that is numerically the strongest. Now the triumph of that class would mean injustice to the minority, which presumably under our principles of government has rights as sacred as those of the majority. Mr. Hearst being a man of intelligence and a student of the science of government knows that any system of government that gives greater protection to the majority than to the minority must fail. He knows that the quickest way to put an end to a government is to flatter the numerically strongest class and persuade it to increase its powers as he is doing when he is arguing in favor of all the expedients of the old market democracy. So when Mr. Hearst pretends to be shocked at a combination of two classes against all other classes he is playing the part of an arrant hypocrite. As a matter of fact the combination that he is shocked at is the one from which the least evil can flow; for when the joint interest of labor and capital is advanced one of the chief interests of the country is advanced. Of course the farmer will kick and the merchant will kick at the combination between the railroad wage-earners and the railroad magnates, but as a railroad stockholder I am heartily in favor of the combination. From a long course of reading—in our daily papers—I have come to the conclusion that this is a government of every class for itself and the devil take the hindmost. I'm for anything that increases dividends. I'd like to see the agitation against railroads ended and a propaganda started against rapacious landlords, the only thoroughbred human hogs in this country. I'm for single tax.

"Tay Pay" and Home Rule

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: From many of your expressions during the past few years I am convinced that you have an intelligent and thoroughly healthy interest in Irish affairs. So have I, but my love of the old land has never received the approval of the professional patriots in our midst, the reason being that I never indulge in the maunderings about "freeing Ireland" that they have traded on for years. But that is not the point. The point is simply this—"Tay Pay" O'Connor is headed this way. He will be in Portland about October 21 and no doubt will drop down upon us. The purpose of his visit to the United States is the same old purpose—he comes "in the interest of Home Rule." That means that "Tay Pay" is a member of a committee of four (the others are John Redmond, Joe Devlin and Daniel Boyle) which is once more appealing for munitions of war to wage battle on the Sassenach. I need not tell you that in this battle the weapon is money and that hundreds of thousands have been taken out of this country in the past for the "good old cause"—but never accounted for. "Tay Pay" is one kind of Irish patriot—the same kind as John Redmond. William O'Brien of Cork is another, the kind I take stock in. Not long ago he too came to this country and what do you suppose his purpose was? The "Freeman's Journal" thus expressed it—"to dry up the financial springs which water the oasis of Home Rule"—and O'Brien confirmed the statement. In other words O'Brien came to America to save Irish-Americans from the rapacity of mercenary patriots who talk about freeing Ireland in the luxurious coigns of their London clubs and who have found their careers as Parliamentarians very satisfactory, even though their "distressful country" is still "in bondage." All nonsense of course! Ireland is better off today than ever before. So let us take a hint from William O'Brien and when "Tay Pay" comes let us receive him cordially—for he is a delightful fellow and tells many good stories—"mainly about people"—but let us dry up the financial springs which water the oasis of Home Rule by buttoning the flaps of our money pockets.

Very respectfully,

—A Hibernian.

Broke! Broke! Broke!

By thy sad gray sands, O sea!
And oh! for the shining shekels spent
That will never come back to me.

Ah! well for the hotelman,

But alas! for my wad of early June,
That has vanished like mist away.

The Avenger

By Karl Hans Strobl (From the German)

The director of the theater telephoned the news to his secretary, who, in his turn, allowed the wonderful tidings to reach the manager; the manager imparted it to Samuel, Agatha and Caspar, who marveled over it in the recesses of the theater wings, and, like a cataract rushing from the heights, the rumor bursting from the clear air of the upper regions found its way even to the ears of the humblest employees of the theater. Thence the news filtered out into the city and stirred up that section of society whose interest centres in things theatrical.

All friends of the dramatic muse shook their heads dubiously, especially the older ones. Out of the gossip presently grew a babel of scandal, conjecture, aphorisms, epigrams clever and the reverse, like the toys, rabbits, ribbons, flowers and bonbons tumbling from the hat of a conjuror.

That morning at eleven Josef Prinz had announced to the director that he was willing to play Hamlet, and when he reached home at three in the afternoon he was met by his landlady as he entered. Her cheeks bore a double allowance of rouge, and her erratically pencilled eyebrows were raised high in excitement, while her arms waved up and down like the sails of an abandoned windmill.

"I have heard! I have heard! Oh, I am beside myself! Is it possible, Herr Prinz? You will again—oh, I cannot believe it—you will again give us Hamlet. Oh, that soliloquy! How you spoke that soliloquy!"

Prinz pushed on past the windmill and struggled to reach the door of his apartment. Followed by the rhapsodies of his landlady, he at last gained it. Then he turned, and on its threshold struck the attitude of a Caesar conferring a gift on a grateful world.

"You shall receive a pass," he cried. Then he took refuge behind a remarkable strong door with heavy bolts.

But at four o'clock he was obliged to admit a messenger from the theater, bringing him his part. And at five the postman delivered twenty-three missives in delicate shades of color, ranging from lilac to rose-pink and emitting every variety of perfume, from musk to heliotrope, all breathing ardent anticipation and intense delight at the prospect of again witnessing his divine interpretation of Hamlet.

With the twilight at half-past six came Prinz's friend, Gustave Rietschl. He found Hamlet dressed in gray, with two blood-red spots on breast and shoulder. He was fencing with a slender blade that straightened itself from a semi-circle as it fell from his grasp to the floor at Rietschl's entrance. All this the mirror gave back in a gray, feeble and lifeless reflection.

"I hear that you are going to play Hamlet again," began his friend.

"I have decided to do so," the actor replied. "The director has urged me to take Shakespearean roles and I—why should I not play Hamlet again? My best role—ridiculous!"

"If you yourself feel that you have got over the affair, why should you not play it? Of course—"

"I—I have got over it," Prinz clutched his rapier, then let it clash back into the scabbard. The blood-red spots on his breast and shoulder seemed for a moment to stand out more vividly against the gray, then faded into shadow. Hamlet continued his feints and thrusts, and his friend saw how the hand seemed directed by an uncertain will.

"How long ago was it that that happened?" he broke in.

"Lucky fellow, not to have had to count those years as I have. Five years of exile from the best and highest that my art affords."

"I can well understand," acquiesced Rietschl, "that every rehearsal, every representation since that time would have brought back the whole thing to you most painfully."

"Merely an idea, my dear fellow, merely an idea. But perhaps you imagine that my conscience—do you mean to imply that it was more than mere accident that caused—"

"Oh, Prinz, Prinz! You do not seem to have recovered yet from the shock. The horror of that affair still unnerves you."

"Yes, it was ghastly as he lay before me. Blood on his jacket, and my blade dripping with blood. Not an acted death from which a man lightly rises to bow, smiling at the audience, but real, true death. One or two writhings and convulsive turns, and then the applause of the spectators fell upon an ear of stone. And the applause was deafening. The public suspected nothing and raved over the triumph of the actors' genius. Fortinbras was obliged to voice the acknowledgments that the rest of us were incapable of making."

The landlady brought the lamps earlier than usual as a pretext to penetrate to Prinz's room. However, her amiability and the superabundance of rouge upon her countenance were alike lost upon him. When she had sullenly withdrawn, Hamlet laid the rapier upon the table.

"An accident, my friend, an unfortunate accident. An oversight of the property man and death stood among us. I swear to you, it was an accident."

"No one thinks otherwise."

"Since that time I provide my own weapon, which is blunt and harmless." He pressed the point of the blade against his palm as if to testify to his innocence. "And yet, when, on the stage, the swords clash, I tremble from head to foot and my fencing is worse than that of any super."

"I have noticed that."

"Have you noticed it? Is it not so? Perhaps the public has noticed it also; still, there has been no criticism. But I ask no favors from Fate. When once again I shall have played Hamlet I shall be myself again. I must once more stand up against Laertes. I must see him rise from the ground and smile, you know. Then I shall have laid this gruesome spectre."

He drew himself up to his full, slender height and aimed a sudden thrust that impaled some incorporeal foe. Then the blade sank in his nerveless hand, as if in dismay at this success.

"Rietschl," he began, "you were with me more than anyone else then, while I lay in fever. What did I most dwell on in my ravings? I mean, what did I say in my delirium?"

"Fragments of the play principally. You spoke a great deal about Ophelia—also about Laertes, but naming them by their real names and referring confusedly to them. There must have been some little reality mixed up in it all, for I think the rumor involving Witte, to which you alluded, had substantial grounds."

"Nonsense." The actor spoke in a tone of annoyance.

"Why not? I thought so, because she immediately withdrew from the company then. People gossiped about it and some insisted that between you and her there had been a rupture on account of Tiefenbach, who took the part of Laertes."

"Absurd! Absurd!"

"You seemed to dwell on this, however; you spoke freely of it in your ravings."

"Nothing but delirium," said Prinz decidedly. "My brain gave out, in confused fragments, truth and untruth all mixed up together. But please Rietschl, don't speak of this again—it is best even between ourselves. Come, Ghost of my Father, let us go and invoke the demon Alcohol."

Next day's rehearsal was a strenuous experience. Prinz, standing with compressed lips pale and resolute, fiercely berated all laggards. The entire cast dreaded a repetition of the first rehearsal. Hamlet had boxed a careless super's ears and sent him sprawling to the wings, where he fell at the feet of Polonius. The super had laid a complaint against Prinz, but most of his colleagues, comprehending his irritability, took extraordinary pains to avoid bringing his wrath upon them during this ordeal. At times he would stand as if embarrassed, motionless among his perplexed confreres like a figure carved out of stone. The triflers among them got together and whispered in the dark corners of the stage.

The young actor who was to play Laertes, and who was in the second year of his engagement, ventured to broach the dangerous subject of his predecessor's fate. Rietschl's silence dashed his curiosity for the time, and he was obliged to rest satisfied with an incoherent string of confused gossip, hazardous conjecture and spiteful allusions retailed to him by King Claudius in the afternoon. This fired him with enthusiasm to play the part and he felt keenly an eager longing to acquit himself in a role that had been marked by a fatality.

"They say—only you must hold your tongue about it—they say it was no accident, but—well, it was premeditated, because Tiefenbach and the Ophelia of the cast—"

So young Laertes dwelt constantly on his coming part and how wonderful an experience it would be to cross blades with a murderer. The role lured him on like an abyss yawning for him. He regarded himself as one who faces fearful peril, the greater and more alluring for being intangible. He became almost beside himself therefore and came near doubting the justice of God, when, on the morning of the day before the representation, he felt himself in the throes of a violent attack of influenza. In spite of his expending a considerable amount of his month's salary for cognac, fever overcame him in the afternoon. He was obliged to go to bed and the doctor's verdict robbed him of all hope of participating in the next evening's representation.

The director and his secretary were no less dismayed over the turn of affairs; they swore at the atrocious weather that was no respecter of theatrical companies, and then they also flew to cognac. At the fifth glass, the secretary made the suggestion to substitute a minor actor for the part of Laertes. But the director spurned this advice. Never, never, never would Prinz submit to an inferior actor taking part in this play.

"His desire is to show what he is capable of by a splendid success, and, by means of this great coup, rehabilitate himself. Your suggestion is impracticable."

At the seventh glass a light flashing upon them showed them a way out of the dilemma.

Siftings from Many Sources

The Catholics, the Methodists and Teddy

For a second time Colonel Roosevelt has become involved in a tangle with the Catholic and Methodist churches and the bitterness of the man incident has been to a large extent redoubled. When the Colonel received the invitation of the Knights of Columbus of Peoria to be a guest of honor and the principal speaker at a banquet on Discovery Day, October 12, he accepted with alacrity but in order to do so found it expedient to turn down an invitation from the Methodists of Peoria who had asked him to officiate at the laying of a cornerstone on the same day. By preferring the Catholic to the Methodist invitation the Colonel offended the Methodists deeply and it turns out that he has not given entire satisfaction to the Catholics. Among the guests invited to the Knights of Columbus banquet were Archbishop Glennon of St. Louis, Bishop Muldoon of Rockford, Bishop Quinn of Peoria and the 215 priests of the diocese. When they learned that Colonel Roosevelt was to be the guest of honor at the banquet the three bishops declined to attend and the inferior clergy promptly followed their example. The friends of the bishops freely asserted that Roosevelt had given deep offense by his faux pas in Rome; hence the absence of the clergy from the Peoria banquet. Meanwhile the Methodists are not speaking kindly of Teddy.

Republicanism in Iberia

If it be admitted that the genius of the Portuguese race is not more fitted for a republican form of government than the Spanish, the logical conclusion seems to be that the new republic will not last long. For Spain has tried the republican form of government and has not liked it. Spain had its republican revolution in 1868 and the new form of government lasted till 1875. That republic was founded on the anti-Catholic propaganda which is so popular with the radicals today in Latin Europe. The Spanish republic started with a great flourish of oratorical trumpets, yet at the end of seven years Spain had to go hat in hand to the Austrian Bourbons, begging them to return. That was not so long ago, yet the radicals of today with short memory and shorter sight are committing the old errors. It will be interesting to see if history repeats itself.

Retired from Congress

To date seventy-eight members of the present Congress have failed of a renomination. No such "slaughter of the innocents" has occurred in the roster of Congress since the memorable disaster to the Republicans after the passage of the McKinley tariff bill in 1890. With the elections still to be heard from, the chance of a large colony of "lame ducks" in Washington during the coming winter is proportionately increased. Of the number of sure absentees in the next Congress 11 are in the Senate and 67 in the House. Of the Senators, 6 are Republican and 5 are Democrats, at least 2 of the Republicans being reasonably certain already of being succeeded by Democrats, while none of the Democrats will be succeeded by a Republican. The losses among the House membership to date show 49 Republicans and 18 Democrats defeated or retiring. Among the Democrats are 5 who voted with the Fitzgerald coterie to support Speaker Cannon in his rules fight, while among the Republican insurgents only one, Charles N. Fowler of New Jersey, has been defeated in the primaries, and 3 have retired, 2 of whom have become Republican nominees for the Senate.

Coal Beds under Scotch Firth

Coal beds under the sea, along the Firth of Forth, Scotland, which have not been worked for 285 years, are soon to be operated by a company which is sinking shafts near Dunfermline, according to a report to this government by Consul Howard D. Van Sant of Dunfermline. The first project for draining coal pits, together with the sinking of a coal pit under water was made there in 1590. In 1625, a storm destroyed the moat from which the coal was taken and the coal beds have remained idle ever since, though repeated attempts have been made to work them. The company which proposes to operate them is building a miners' settlement for four or five thousand inhabitants. An interesting experiment in housing the miners is to be made. A dozen houses near the water are each to be provided with bathrooms for the miners. The workers are urged to have two suits of clothes, one for use underground and the other for wearing to and from the colliery and to avail themselves of the baths daily immediately upon ascending from the mine. At the company's office, the consul learned that only about one in five of the miners will avail himself of these privileges, although the cost to each miner would not be more than $10 a year.

They Don't Want Cavalieri

Owing to the notoriety of Lina Cavalieri's separation from "Bob" Chanler a large number of the men and women who support the symphony orchestra of St. Paul have protested against the singer's appearance with the orchestra in their home city and have compelled the director to arrange with the Metropolitan Opera Company to send Madame Frances Alda as a substitute. The director was disgusted with the scruples of the musical patrons and in wiring for Madame Alda advised the Metropolitan people to send a copy of her marriage contract along. This bit of sarcasm was very strongly resented by the patrons who have the courage of their convictions in matters of morals but are a bit thin-skinned when it comes to enduring ridicule. It is not thought that New York will have the same objection to Cavalieri that St. Paul manifested. It will be remembered that the monkey house scandal did not impair Caruso's popularity in the metropolis.

The Spectator

Dr. Brown for Brown

Among the press despatches of Tuesday last was one of eight lines from Boston to the effect that the trustees of Brown University are about to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Dr. William E. Huntington from the presidency, and that one of the three men under consideration is the Rev. Charles R. Brown of Oakland, Cal. Thus do I obtain verification of the report to which I have been giving publicity with reference to the restlessness of a distinguished clergyman. And now, with pride and exultation, I call the attention of all my contemporaries to the scoop with which I startled the good deacons of the First Congregational Church, not one of whom had the faintest inkling of Dr. Brown's contemplated resignation. At the same time I must reproach my contemporaries for neglecting to appreciate a piece of news that has caused a sensation in church circles in this State greater than they have experienced in many years. Three times have I alluded to Dr. Brown's sudden determination to abandon Oakland to her fate. Thrice have I tipped my contemporaries to the story of the hour in Oakland, a story of the profoundest interest to that highly cultivated class across the bay by whom the fashionable pastor of the First Congregational Church is regarded as the most charming of all apostles of sweetness and light. Yet not one of my contemporaries sensed the importance of the news or thought it worth while to make inquiries with a view to supplying their readers with details which I generously omitted that they might have the satisfaction of filling in the blanks of what any capable journalist must have regarded as an incomplete story. Why have the city editors neglected to enlighten their readers on the subject of Dr. Brown's passion for pastures new? Even though it was but a mere rumor that the cultured clergyman was about to sever his connection with the First Congregational Church, surely it was worth while to hunt it down. It is one of the chief functions of the press to keep us informed about the movements and contemplated movements of great men. And Dr. Brown is a great man. In Oakland there are many good people convinced that he is the greatest man on their side of the bay, not excepting Dr. Wheeler.

They admire him for his goodness as well as his greatness. They know him to be a man of high ideals up to which he religiously lives. I hope that Dr. Brown is chosen for President of Brown, and I hope that not a single knock will be put in from Oakland.

The Foiling of the Hero

A miserable conductor employed by the Octopus utterly ruined a beautiful one-act drama the other day by failing to do his duty. The scene was a train of the Coast Division. The prospective hero, full of his part, bursting with a sense of the potentialities of the drama, his feelings properly attuned to the occasion, was none other than our most recently improvised public benefactor, the most picturesque of all patriots in buckram, the Hon. Hiram Johnson. He was also playwright and producer. The play though a plagiarism, in fact, a clean steal from Walter Martin's one-act drama recently tried on the dog en route to Burlingame, was full of good fustian, and doubtless would have made a great hit with the innumerable unsophisticated whose emotions are ever susceptible to the dramatic, patriotic appeal. But the miserable conductor, a veritable Mr. Malaprop, injected a fatal faux pas and the motive of the play slipped a cog, transforming the denouement and precipitating an unexpected and illogical catastrophe. It was like this: A crowded car, no seat for the hero, and consequently the hero, uncompromising foe of the Octopus, resolves to embrace the heroine—rosy-checked Opportunity. "No seat, no ticket!" exclaims the hero through clenched teeth. Here was the conductor's cue to throw him off the train, thereby calling all the State to witness that he doesn't ride on a pass and that his hatred of the bloated corporation is genuine. But the dampfool conductor who ought to have been cast for a farce instead of a tragedy utterly failed to enter into the spirit of the situation. Instead of doing the obvious he went over to a friend, an agricultural person, one of the plain people, told him his trouble and asked him to surrender his seat to the grouch. This incredibly amiable individual, who had no business in the play at all, got up and Hiram sat down. The conductor took the ticket, and the train moved right along, but not the play. And poor Hiram, instead of looming up as a hero, looked to everybody in the car like a pretty disagreeable person. His fellow-passengers scowled at him for taking a stranger's seat, and some of them were for throwing him off, apparently not realizing that the play was over.

Thrift in Politics

The political campaign is not exciting unbounded enthusiasm among the strikers and ward heelers. These undesirable citizens who are in the game for all they can get out of it are muttering that the good old times are gone. Whenever the curbstone loungers make that plaint it may be taken as a tip that there is not a great deal of money being dispensed at headquarters, and that is the situation at present. The Republicans are spending more money than the Democrats but that does not mean a great deal, for the minority party is very hard up for funds. Economy is the order of the day and at the headquarters of both parties it is so difficult for a district worker to get a dollar out of the treasury that many in disgust have given up trying and are hoping that their reward for faithful service may come after the election.

Economy in Sacramento and Stockton

But this is not the only city where thrift is the order of the day in politics. In Sacramento the county central committees of the two parties got together last week, and decided that no money should be spent for meetings of candidates. This edict struck consternation to many hearts. It meant that the district halls would not be rented and swathed in red, white and blue, that no bands would be hired, no cordwood piled up in the street to make bonfires and most important of all, that the corner groceryman would not have to order a few extra kegs of beer for the thirsty orators and their crowds of admirers. The revolutionary policy is summarized by the Sacramento Union: "Let each candidate root hog or die!" In Stockton the politicians and office-seekers have gone to a greater extreme. They have formed a union of candidates the object of which is to protect the members from the extortions of persons who demand that they buy tickets to fairs and entertainments and contribute to all kinds of shows and socials. Could anything be more discouraging? Is there any telling where the new spirit of economy will end?

The Cause of It All

There can be little doubt that the thrift which is so apparent at party headquarters is owing to the operation of the direct primary. The recent primary election throughout the State was tremendously expensive to the political parties. Money flowed like water in many sections and long before the canvass was over complaints about the drain were to be heard from all sides. The consequence was that when the general election campaign began the party coffers were empty and most of the usual sources of replenishment had been exhausted. It was such hard work to raise money that great discretion was exercised in spending it. There are all sorts of opinions for and against the direct primary law but the men of all shades of opinion are pretty well agreed that it makes elections almost prohibitively expensive.

Coddling the Country Editors

Never before in their careers have the country editors of the State received such distinguished consideration as has been lavished on them since the local boosters of the Panama-Pacific Exposition discovered that many of them were hostile to the proposition of bonding the State. As soon as the editorial expressions of the interior sheets voiced opposition to this vital project the men who have taken up the fight got busy. They brought all sorts of local influence to bear to turn the recalcitrant editors to a proper view of the situation, the expedients varying with the conditions of the various communities. Finally they lured a lot of the editors to the city: gave them joy rides and elaborate meals, lost no opportunity to sauce the feast with argument in favor of that bond issue. Some of the editors were open to conviction more quickly than others but it cannot be said that any of them showed undue stubbornness. Once they realized that World's Fair would be a benefit, not to San Francisco alone but to the whole State, they acknowledged the conquest of their most powerful objection. At the same time some of them strung to their assent and these will be carefully watched lest they fly off the handle again.

The Preacher-Editor from Sawtelle

There was Dr. Taft, for instance. A difficult proposition to manipulate was Dr. Taft. He comes from the interesting community of Sawtelle in Los Angeles County and is at once preacher and an editor. In Sawtelle he ornaments the sanctum and the pulpit with equal grace but into the metropolitan conditions of the city he does not fit at all. Some time ago he wrote an interesting little brochure not circulated to fill San Franciscans with joy entitled "San Francisco, the Modern Gomorrah." The title of course was not written as a bit of fair literature and it was too much to expect that the local boosters should wax enthusiastic over its author. Yet Dr. Taft, as a country editor, was entertained with the rest of the bunch and at the dinner at the St. Francis on Saturday night was even allowed to ventilate his views in oratory. The speeches at that banquet had been mercifully short and there was consternation when Dr. Taft quietly remarked: "Anticipating that I might be called upon to address this gathering I prepared a few remarks which I will take the liberty of reading to you. But first I would like to make a few introductory remarks." Dr. Taft then launched into fifteen minutes of introductory remarks and thereafter read for twenty minutes more. The cream of his suggestions was that there should be no liquor on or near the

Steinway Pianola Piano at Kohler & Chase

¶ The Steinway Pianola Piano is a combination of the Steinway Upright and the Pianola. The makers of the Steinway Piano looked far and wide for the best player in the world to be linked with the Steinway Piano—it is the Pianola that has been chosen. You should follow this distinguished example when you come to buy a player-piano. Be sure that you get the genuine Pianola. Do not be satisfied with any weak substitute. Please remember that Pianola Piano is a name for a certain kind of player-piano and is not a name for all player-pianos. Remember that there are 300 features in the Pianola Piano, which are not to be found in any other player-piano.

¶ In addition to the Steinway, you will find the genuine Pianola only in the Weber Pianola Piano, the Steck Pianola Piano, the Stuyvesant Pianola Piano and the Wheelock Pianola Piano. This entire line can be found only at Kohler & Chase.

grounds and that there should be no Midway dance attractions. The speech was not wildly lauded. At the conclusion of the banquet somebody introduced Dr. Taft to Joe Cummings, secretary of the Mechanics Institute. "Are you a newspaperman?" asked Dr. Taft. "I do the journalistic work," confessed Cummings. Anticipating that I might meet a newspaperman who I have prepared copies of my speech for press," said Dr. Taft, handing Cummings a typewritten manuscript. As Joe is dramatic critic for Musical Review I am afraid that Dr. Taft's speech will perish unpublished.

Alty at the Orpheum

Tuesday last was a red letter night at the Orpheum for there were two royalties in the theater at the same time. In a box on one side of the theater sat His Royal Nibs the Sultan of Bonneau, resplendent in tight fitting clothes "off the top" a red necktie and celluloid cuffs. On the other side, also in a box sat "King" Bonneau, famed in the height of fashion. Not everybody knows why the popular mining and oil man is called by this regal title. He has a perfect right to it, for he is the king of a little island in the South Pacific. Some years ago Bonneau happened to visit this island and met its owner who was an eccentric but good-hearted Englishman. Bonneau and the Englishman became very good friends and when the Englishman went away Bonneau helped him out of his financial straits and afterwards formed a business association with him. When the Englishman died he left the island to Bonneau in his will and his living relatives in England confirmed the title. Bonneau is as much a King as His Nibs of Bonneau is a Sultan.

also Bill Strikes it Rich was chatting with Buffalo Bill a few nights ago and learned with interest that he is to have new connections in this city in the near future. He has bought a gold mine in Arizona and is going to devote his attention to its development when he retires from the wild west business. He told me that he intended to ship his family to this city. Buffalo Bill thinks that mining is most as exciting as making good Indians out of red men and he has always had a fondness for it. "But I was in the mining business thirty years," he told me, "before I struck a big proposition. Now I've got a big thing." Of course Buffalo Bill is not dependent on his mining venture for the little comforts that soothe an aging man. He has put by a tidy heap of money during his years as a public entertainer. The wild west show has been a gold mine for him and he has plenty of capital to invest. It's under the impression he doesn't go into the oil business like the other fighting hero, Admiral "Bob" Evans.

Ranch at Cody

may not be generally known that Buffalo Bill has an immense ranch at Cody, Wyoming, and that he raises there the horses for his show as well as cattle. The particular importance of this ranch is that it is the only eastern entrance to the Yellowstone Park. Visitors to the park at present have to enter by the Oregon Short Line on the west or by the Northern Pacific on the north. Buffalo Bill has been trying for some time to induce the Burlington to build a branch to Cody in order that eastern tourists may enter the park through his ranch. The trip is impracticable now on account of the long stage trip that would be necessary but with a branch line to Cody Buffalo Bill could carry tourists into the park on stages and make a barrel of money. Some day perhaps the Burlington will see the advantage of sharing the profits of eastern tourist travel to the Yellowstone and Buffalo Bill will go into the stage line business.

Chief Seymour

Now that John Seymour is Chief of Police it is at once interesting and instructive to recall the imputations made against the present Administration by the newspaper enemies thereof prior to his appointment. I hold no brief for the McCarthy Administration. Indeed I am very much opposed to putting the government of municipal affairs in the hands of the representatives of any class of citizens. I feel, however, that much worse than class administration is the slandering of public officials, the spreading broadcast of the report that the city is in the hands of grafters and looters. Now it is not to be denied that prior to the appointment of John Seymour the police department was a disgrace to the city. But apparently it is not true that the city government was rotten to the core, as it was represented to be by certain mendacious journals that can see no virtue in anything or anybody beyond their chaste control. By innuendo these journals industriously propagated the belief that the police department was conducted in accordance with the wishes of the Mayor. They intimated that there was no likelihood of a change of management because the Mayor dared not incur the hostility of an official who might besmirch him by way of revenge. That such imputations were absolutely groundless is now obvious. Chief Martin has been removed from office, and John Seymour has been given full charge of the department. John Seymour is unique in this—that notwithstanding his honesty he commands both the respect and approval of the Boughten Bulletin, the severest and most unscrupulous of Mayor McCarthy's critics, a circumstance that causes one to wonder whether it misunderstands him. For certainly John Seymour is not the type of man that ordinarily would find favor with the most rapacious of newspapers. Trained under Pat Crowley, and a man in whom Pat Crowley had unlimited confidence, he is eminently fitted for the position both by reason of his honesty and his ability. Everybody that knows him has faith in John Seymour. Everybody that knows him believes him when he says that Mayor McCarthy appointed him with the understanding that he should have full power to act. Chief Martin has gone and he has had nothing to say and the police department is no longer stimulating the business of any distillery or of any artful dodgers.

INFORMATION by TELEPHONE

PEOPLE are not leaving so much to chance in these days of universal telephone service. Instead of risking disappointment they telephone and get the facts.

Will school be held on a stormy morning, will your friend be in if you call, what does the weather man predict and when does the train leave—are samples of myriads of questions constantly passing over the wire, and being answered by the proper authorities.

There are also questions to be asked about the telephone service, how somebody can be reached over the Bell Long Distance Telephone and what it will cost, and similar questions, which are being answered by the information operators.

The Man-Hunt

The Los Angeles dynamite fiends are still at large. Which is not contrary to what might have been expected notwithstanding the many clues with which our Corentins, Vautrins and Sherlock Holmes's were supplied immediately after the crime. It is never judicious to make a brass band one of the accessories in a hunt for criminals. This hunt for the dynamiters has been conducted in a way that suggests the possibility of the newspapers having been hired to give warning to the fugitives. Then men on whom suspicion fell were quickly apprised of the fact, and they have been made aware of every step that has been taken to bring them to justice. The detectives in charge of the case have hardly made a move without telling the press about it. On several of their excursions in quest of evidence they have been accompanied by reporters and photographers. At the very start of the hunt the human bloodhounds quarreled over the question of precedence, and quit the scent to engage in a controversy, the momentous problem being, Who was to be entitled to the glory of successful achievement? In the circumstances it is no wonder that the murderers have thus far managed to elude their pursuers. If they are ever caught it will probably be as the result either of the detectives being informed of their whereabouts by some person wishing to share in the reward or of an accident similar to that which led to the apprehension of a suspect in Sacramento.

Mrs. Atherton's Advice

Gertrude Atherton has despatched a letter from her tower of ivory to the editor of the New York Times in order to place herself on record anent Upton Sinclair's scheme for the endowment of young authors of talent. Mrs. Atherton is strongly opposed to the scheme. She says that she is a firm believer in a hard school for authors, in the survival of the fit. "I was four years getting my first novel published," says Mrs. Atherton, "and I now know that it was not worth print and paper, being merely the usual enthusiastic product of raw talent; but at that time I thought it a great book, publishers incredibly stupid, and myself too far in advance of modern ideas to be appreciated." Mrs. Atherton declares that she would have been much better employed during those four years if she had been reporting on a newspaper. The newspaper office she considers the school for authors. By working as a reporter, she says, the ambitious youth can save enough money to enable him to retire to a farmhouse for a year. Then he can try his hand at literary work and if he has the stuff of success in him his output will find favor with the publishers. Mrs. Atherton lays down these rules for the beginner:

Work on a newspaper until all your crude notions of life and all your raw "individualities" have been blue-pencilled into limbo; then retire into obscurity and write your fiction.

Travel, if possible.

Do not marry.

Do not dissipate.

Do not imitate Henry James.

Never read reviews of your own work.

Never say die.

"Do Not Marry"

Mrs. Atherton's repetition of Punch's famous advice about matrimony raises anew a very old speculation. How many authors have impaired their work by assuming domestic responsibilities? It would be easy to make a list of the great authors who were unhappy in their marriages but it is not a simple matter to point out wherein the galling of the home tie hurt their literary productions. May it not be that many authors have achieved literary fame on account of their domestic unhappiness? I remember that one of Lincoln's biographers accounts for his success as a public man by his lack of marital felicity, the theory being that his office was less distasteful than his home. If there is any merit in this peculiar theory it might be well to substitute for Mrs. Atherton's "Do not marry," the cynical "Do not marry happily." However, the fact remains that celibacy is not widely practiced among our literary people. Most of the Carmelites and other men and women who have been successful in literature married before they achieved publication.

The Poetess of San Berdoo

That San Berdoo has a poetess who must be accorded recognition among the minor singers of the State was proclaimed recently when Fannie P. McGehee signalized the dedication of a memorial in Meadowbrook Park by the recitation of a series of couplets. Miss McGehee's muse delights in irregular meters for tetrameters, pentameters and hexameters flow from her pen with equal readiness and without apparent plan. A few lines will indicate the quality of her effusion:

Bring here the children from the noisy street;
In these clear waters bid them lave their feet—
That on life's pathway soon may tread
Perhaps with heavy heart and aching head.

Aside from the hyperbole of the first line which assigns noise to the streets of placid San Berdoo,

The inference to be drawn from them seems to be that if the children are induced to get their feet in Meadowbrook they will grow with strength to bear the heavy heart and dingy head that come to the walker along life's pathway. "The Jack Rabbit" Disappears Again

Captain John J. O'Connell of the Twenty-ninth Infantry, has disappeared from his post at Fort Snelling and no word of his whereabouts has so far reached his brother officers. The disappearance took place on September 11 following Captain O'Connell's return to St. Paul from Oshkosh, Wis., where he had been in command of an instruction camp for two months. This will be interesting news to Captain O'Connell's friends in this city. He was well known here before the fire and his impetuosity of disposition gained him the nickname of "the Jack Rabbit." While he was at the Presidio in 1904 he disappeared just as mysteriously as he has disappeared this time and the same thing happened in 1905 at Fort Snelling. But those disappearances only lasted for a few days. He was tried by court-martial, pleaded guilty and was reprimanded. This time the case is much more serious.

The Disappearance of Lieutenant Otis

Speaking of the disappearance of army officers reminds me of the most curious instance which ever came to my notice. I refer to the disappearance of Lieutenant Frank Otis, a brother of the well-known Paulist, Father Otis. Otis belonged, I think, to the Fifth Cavalry and was stationed at the Presidio. He had risen from the ranks and had proved his bravery in Indian fighting, but he was regarded as queer by the other officers of his regiment. One day he astounded the post by advertising in the Examiner for a position in civil life. When interviewed he explained that he could not support his wife and numerous babies on a lieutenant's pay and had decided to leave the service. The affair was given a great deal of notoriety and shortly afterwards Otis was ordered to New York where he was examined and found to be suffering from what the experts labelled "confusional insanity." After treatment on Governor's Island he was ordered back to the Presidio, but disappeared completely on the return trip, leaving no clue behind him. Every effort to find him failed and his wife and children were forced to seek shelter with relatives in Santa Rosa. Whether Frank Otis ever turned up I do not know but if he did the news of his return did not get into the papers.

John Hays Hammond, Political Prophet

John Hays Hammond, Jameson Raider, mining engineer and copper expert, is in New York, drawn thither by the biennial convention of the National Republican League of which he is president. Hammond signalized his arrival in New York by making a very optimistic prophecy of Republican success in the approaching elections. Bye-elections convey little significance to Hammond for he brushes aside the Maine results with an easy wave of the hand. He belittles the "apparent Republican discord in some parts of the country" and with the confidence of one enunciating axiomatic truth declares that the next Congress will be Republican by a safe majority. "The Republican party has weathered many a storm," he sagely remarks. It will be remembered that Hammond contributed to the gayety of the last national contest by appearing in Chicago as a candidate for vice-president on the Republican ticket. One of the most exciting features of his canvass was the lavish distribution of forty cent cigars. Hammond's political complacency received a rude shock on that memorable occasion but it seems to be trying valorously to "come back."

Williams Writes a Play

Michael Williams, a member of the brilliant coterie of writers that has given more than local fame to Carmel-by-the-Sea, recently completed a play which, in the opinion of his friends, will be a great success. From what Williams tells me of the theme of his drama I gather the impression that he has tackled a mighty big subject. He says that it deals with the insurgent movement in politics without contributing in any way to partisan propaganda, with woman's place in modern public life without particular reference to the suffrage question and with the spiritual element in ordinary affairs, this last having no reference, he says, to Christian Science. It will be seen that Williams is not afraid to attack big problems. Jack London, for one, is of the opinion that he has grappled with them successfully. He wrote to Williams, after reading the play, that it would take the world by storm.

It is curved to fit any portion of the body and held in place by means of a bag and belt allowing the wearer to move about at will.

He Wrote "The Face upon the Floor"

Do you remember the ambitious elocutionist at the graduating exercises of the grammar school who used to recite the touching piece that tells how the vagabond crept into "Joe's bar room on the corner of the square" and asked the "goodly crowd" to treat him to a drink and how he went on to tell of his youthful success as an artist and his love for the most beautiful of women who proved unfaithful and how he started to draw her picture on the bar room floor and "with a fearful shriek he leaped and fell across the picture—dead"? Well, the author of "The Face upon the Floor," Mr. H. A. D'Arcy, is in town as the manager of "The Witching Hour" company. A very interesting gentleman is Mr. D'Arcy when he can be induced to tell of his associations as a youngster in London with Du Maurier and George R. Sims who wrote "Ostler Joe" and "The Lights o' London." I suppose "The Face upon the Floor" has been recited in public a million times—it has been translated into French—yet the author sold it to the New York Despatch for fifteen dollars. Mr. D'Arcy reminded me, when I met him at the Savoy the other night, that we had just passed the anniversary of the Chicago fire and he told me of a bit of luck illustrating the Biblical injunction about "casting your bread upon the waters." At the time of the Chicago fire he had just arrived in New York, a stranger without much money; but when the subscription was started he contributed fifteen dollars. The first New Yorkers to subscribe to the fund were Jim Fiske and Tony Pastor but by some chance Mr. D'Arcy's name appeared in the papers at the head of the list. Noticing this he bought a paper and took it to his lodgings where he read that a publicity man was needed for the Nashville Mardi Gras. He immediately went south, obtained the place and received $4,000 for his work. That subscription to the Chicago fire fund really gave him his start in America.

STONE FACE IN THOUSAND OAKS

New Residence Park Contains One of Nature's Wonders

In Thousand Oaks, the beautiful residence park recently opened in northern Berkeley, there is a natural wonder in the shape of a stone face, which is as remarkable and as perfect as the famous "Great Stone Face." Many interesting stories are grouped about this strange rock formation—in fact some of them go back into the legendary period.

The Indians are known to have worshipped at the shrine of this great image long before the white man reached this coast, perhaps even before he set foot upon the continent. They considered this oak covered knoll (now Thousand Oaks) sacred because of the presence of the massive face of stone, and celebrated their religious rites there.

After the Indians had departed the property containing this knoll and the weird face, was comprised in the Boswell ranch. Because of the fine trees and rocks and the view of the bay Thousand Oaks became a popular picnic ground, and the early settlers of the bay region used to drive miles to spend a day in this lovely spot. The owners were always willing that the public should enjoy the great natural beauty of this knoll, and held it intact through many years.

The popularity of Thousand Oaks became so great after several generations had picnicked there, that the city of Berkeley desired to acquire it as a public park, so an option on the property was obtained and three years ago a bond issue for making Thousand Oaks a permanent park for the city was voted upon. The issue was defeated by some sixty votes, though it had the support of the most influential citizens of the college town.

Now this remarkably beautiful section of Berkeley is being built up, but Newell and Hendricks, the San Francisco and Berkeley firm, handling the property, have set the stone face apart so that the public may still enjoy it. A park called "Stone Face Park" encloses this natural phenomenon which many people visit Thousand Oaks to see.

Several costly homes are now being built in this beautiful residence district and others will be commenced at once, that they may be finished by the time the Southern Pacific's electric trains are in operation next March. Another page in the history of this property will have been written when there is a 35 minute service to San Francisco from a handsome station two blocks away. Then the Indian's favorite camping ground will have become the finest home section of the bay district, for it will have transportation such as no other property has, and will retain its original beauty, enhanced by high class improvements and protected by restrictions.

"Mr. Grimes," said the rector to the vestryman, "we had better take up the collection before the sermon this morning."

"Indeed?"

"Yes. I'm going to preach on the subject of economy."

The Prettiest Bud and the Most Popular

Not until the debutantes are lined up at the first "Greenway" on November 4 will it be possible to fairly pick the prettiest. Then it is expected that Miss Lee Girvin will win the palm for beauty. She is tall and slender with soft shining light brown hair and an exquisite complexion. And like all of the debutantes this year she has a charmingly natural and graceful manner. They are altogether a very well brought up set of girls, not too shy but with enough quiet dignity to keep them fresh and unspoiled. Most of them have been educated in the East with the finishing year abroad, and that always gives a certain poise which is more attractive than the bashful bewilderment that used to attack the young in their first season. Miss Ysabel Chase bids fair to be the most popular. She has the winning personality that seems a heritage of the Mizners (her mother was Minnie Mizner), and the frank good humor that distinguishes Uncle Addison. She is already conceded to be the luckiest of the debutantes since Mrs. Will Tevis has promised her a coming-out ball that will rival Ethel Crocker's in brilliance, and Mrs. William Miller Graham has brought her from Paris a wonderful array of party gowns.

Eligible Clarence Follis

Clarence Follis has returned to this city after an absence of two years and I have an idea that the managing mammas are preparing to lay siege to his strongly fortified bachelorhood. For Clarence Follis is a very eligible young man. He is associated with Alexander Rutherford in Wall Street and has a very satisfactory monthly income. His position in society here is unimpeachable and he has what so many of our society favorites long for but never attain, a standing in the society of London and New York. Among London's fashionables he was sponsored by Lady Paget while the Vanderbilts have presided over his social activities in New York and Newport. In addition to all this he is handsome and of fascinating address. Yet he has ever shown himself indifferent to the maneuvers of the mothers and the charms of the daughters. Nobody seems to have made an impression on his heart. That makes him a very interesting subject for operations and it will be worth while watching what happens while he is here. He is making his abode with the Frank Griffins.

About Marian Lally

A little bird has brought me a story to the effect that the engagement of Miss Marian Lally will soon be announced. The little bird says that I may not publish the name of the lucky youth but adds that I may indicate his personality for the benefit of the wise. He is a blonde young man in the early twenties and he is in the employ of Miss Lally's father who is in the profitable but unromantic business of manufacturing plumbers' supplies. Miss Lally, it will be remembered, took steps a short time ago to recover from a popular transbay hostess the value of a millinery confection of hers which had been discussed not wisely but too well by a pet dog.

The Teddy Jrs. in a Toy Shop

The young Teddy Roosevelts attracted much interest the other day in the toy department of one of the shops where Theodore Jr. evinced the keenest interest in all the mechanical contrivances. They made several purchases for some happy youngsters and then departed. Mrs. Roosevelt is easily one of the prettiest young matrons in San Francisco with the slim figure of the so-called New York type that makes her look taller than she really is. It was one of the warm days of last week and she wore a gown of some thin apricot colored material with much white about it. There was a broad black girdle and just the suggestion of a hobble where the skirt was caught in at the back with a soft black satin bow. Her hat was a broad light straw thing with feathers.

Is Their Engagement Pending?

Society folk have been watching pretty Miss Elizabeth Newhall very closely of late and have taken to wondering whether Bert Payne has re-established himself in her affections. There is no doubt of his deep devotion. In their very early teens Miss Newhall and young Payne were deeply smitten but Bert Payne went East to college and Miss Newhall was taken abroad by her family, remaining several years. Since her return she has had many admirers, always including Payne, and now her intimate friends seem to think that the old feeling has deepened and that he is the preferred suitor. Bert Payne is the son of the late Theodore Payne who married Miss Pauline O'Brien, a niece of William S. O'Brien. He was considered the handsomest and best dressed man of his day. Bert resembles his father.

The Vivacious Mrs. Oelrichs

The availability of Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs for matrimonial purposes is a matter in which Newporters and New York smartsetters take a deep and perennial interest. Though no longer young she is still very attractive, and there are many young bachelors in New York and vicinity who believe that with her resources it is in her power to make a man with a small income well satisfied with life. So she is never suffering from want of attention from young blades and middle-aged beaux. And all the while the gossips of society and the press believing that there is likely to be something doing at any moment are constantly at the gay widow's heels. At the Vanderbilt cup races the other day she made her appearance in the company of Barclay Warburton, on whom, it was noticed, she bestowed many glowing smiles, and according to one reporter "she was in a very happy frame of mind, but whether from the presence of Mr. Warburton, or the fact that she had consumed such a good breakfast washed down with champagne" he did not know. Thus do the chroniclers of vital current events keep in close, intimate touch with the important personages who make our social history. But how astonishing that the reporter who took note of what a lady consumed for breakfast neglected to ascertain the source of her happiness! Why should he permit his readers to be consumed with curiosity that he might have gratified by

The Lyric Irish Renaissance

If William Butler Yeats were coming to town tomorrow to lecture on "The Lyric Irish Renaissance" there would be something of a stir in local literary circles. For Yeats has himself figured in this renaissance, and besides he is a man of great fame. The perfume of fame has a fascination that few can resist. Now I have no hesitation in confessing that I should be less interested in the coming of Yeats than I am in the coming of Miss Agnes Tobin, who is to lecture on "Lyric Irish Renaissance" both Pagan and Christian under the auspices of the Caedmon Club, which is eager to do honor to so brilliant a woman. By doing her honor the Caedmon Club will do honor to itself. Though native here and a resident it is proper to speak of "the coming" of Miss Tobin, for her personality in its relation to literature is better known abroad than at home. All of our poets and other writers, with the exception of Agnes Tobin, are very much in the public eye. We are constantly reminded of them. They are never out of print. But as it often happens that those of whom we speak least at home are best known in heaven, so, too, those of whom we speak least in the provinces are best known in the literary centres of the earth. Agnes Tobin's literary performances have won encomiums from foreign critics who would consider it a waste of time to review the books of some of our most popular California writers. She has mingled in the society of the elect of literature in Ireland, England, France and Italy and she has obtained an insight of the progress of her art in these countries which it is the good fortune of but few to enjoy. Her lecture, I predict, will be instructive and entertaining. The affair is complimentary. Tickets may be obtained either from Miss Tobin or from Mrs. Driscoll, President of the Caedmon Club, at 1798 Broadway.

Wade Chance in Reno

How many of Wade Chance's friends in this city know that he is sojourning quietly in Reno with intent to free himself from the galling matrimonial bonds that join him to the erstwhile Mrs. Van Rensselaer Cruger? Probably neither the fact that he is in Reno nor the fact that his matrimonial bonds are galling is known to many here, for Wade Chance has not been in San Francisco for a long time and has not kept in touch with his western friends. But now that he is so near it is quite likely that he will drop down to the coast for a bit of diversion during the uncomfortable six months which he will have to spend in Reno if his attorneys convince him that the recent decision of the New York Supreme Court on the validity of Reno divorces is inapplicable to his case. Naturally his lawyers will attempt as much for the Reno legal fraternity is of a thrifty disposition and hates to see a promising client slip away.

A Queer Romance

The romance of Mrs. Van Rensselaer Cruger and Wade Chance was more than a nine days' wonder, for it was the romance of a very young man and an elderly widow. Chance secured an uncertain footing on the edge of New York's social stage by acting as cavalier servente to several matrons of the so-called "horse-hair set." As he had known the McKinleys in Canton he expected to get further along, and when progress was interrupted he tried amateur theatricals and fancy dancing. Then he went in for literary work and banking and tried the atmosphere of London. He found it more congenial for it was there that he met, Stephen Van Rensselaer's widow who was forty years his senior. They married but peace did not take up permanent abode in their home. And now Wade is preparing to regain his liberty

Another Reno Affair

Another New Yorker who will soon join the colony of Reno divorce-seekers, if rumor reports correctly, is Mrs. Ross Ambler Curran, a well known society woman who is just now staying with friends in this State. Mrs. Ross Ambler Curran was Elise Postley, the daughter of Clarence Postley. She is therefore the sister-in-law of Mrs. Sterling Postley (Edith Cook) who, it will be remembered, was declared by the Grand Duke Boris of Russia the most beautiful American woman he had ever met. The Currans have been uncongenial in their domestic life for some time but the impending divorce is not to the taste of Ross Curran. He left his luxurious quarters in Paris not long ago to attempt a reconciliation with his wife, but without avail, and it is said that the lady will soon depart for the haven of the ill-mated.

The Shawhan Family

The success which attended the debut of Miss Violet Romer, the daughter of Mrs. Ada Romer Shawhan, has called attention to a very interesting family. John E. Shawhan, the grandfather of the pretty young dancer, was one of the wealthiest mining men of the city thirty years ago. The family lived in luxurious style at the Palace Hotel. Mrs. Shawhan was very fond of society and was lavish in her expenditures. She was also passionately fond of horses and her husband built a stable in California street which was dubbed "Shawhan's Folly." Mrs. Shawhan had the upper portion elaborately furnished and she was in the habit of driving from the Palace and sitting there for hours feasting her eyes on her thoroughbreds. "Shawhan's Folly" was eventually bought by the Finnigans and converted into a home. Mrs. Shawhan was also a dog fancier and as the Palace management would not permit dogs in the guest rooms a hotel porter would bring her dogs to her every day and the ceremony of inspection would occupy considerable time. Mamie Shawhan and her sister Agnes were educated at Notre Dame College in San Jose while the three boys went to Santa Clara. Mamie married Charles Hanlon, the lawyer and died many years ago. The father of the dancer, Violet Romer, was McCune Shawhan. By the way, Miss Phoebe Davis, the actress, came from the East to be present at the debut of Miss Romer on account of her longstanding friendship for Mrs. Ada Romer Shawhan. Miss Davis is stopping with the Shawhans in Sacramento street and will accompany the youthful dancer East. She is confident that she will be as great a success in New York as she has been in her native city.

Not an Imitator of Maude Allan

Miss Violet Romer's dancing has long been a subject of enthusiastic praise among the members of the California Club where she gave her first public exhibition. Judge of the indignation of these clubwomen, therefore, when they read in the critique of one of the morning papers that Miss Romer showed in her dancing the influence of Maude Allan. It was quite plain the critic thought that Miss Romer had borrowed her "Spring Song" from Maude Allan and as the California clubwomen knew otherwise they were greatly exercised by the statement. They point out that Miss Romer first danced the "Spring Song" at their club in March which was some time before Maude Allan made her first appearance here. As Miss Romer gave the same interpretation then which she gave at the Columbia the charge of imitation is unfounded.

The Stork Visits "Peggy" Naylor

Word comes from Fort Sill, Oklahoma, that Mrs. Harold Naylor, the bride of Lieutenant Naylor, has received a visit from the stork and is the mother of a fine girl. This will interest the many friends that Mrs. Naylor made during her residence in this city. She was pretty and vivacious Peggy Simpson, the daughter of Colonel Will Simpson who was our adjutant general for a time. He has since been transferred to the Department of the Lakes in the same capacity. His daughter's marriage to Lieutenant Naylor was one of the social events of last sea-

Mrs. Will Lyle who is a relative by marriage has received word that Mrs. Lee, the grandmother of the bride has joined her at Fort Sill and also to the interesting effect that the little newcomer weighs ten pounds.

Cholly Francisco's Obligation

I noticed last week that Cholly Francisco, the flaneur of the Examiner, had appropriated my idea of holding a hobble race for society girls. Well, it is a good idea, if I do say so myself, and I am not unwilling that Cholly should appropriate it. At the same time, I wish to remind Cholly that he is under obligations to me in this matter as he has been before in several others of greater or less importance. Whenever Cholly's fund of originality runs low I have not the least objection to his borrowing from mine. Appropriation, after all, is the sincerest form of literary flattery. My dear Cholly, you may continue to draw on me ad lib!

As to "The Witching Hour"

By Edward F. O'Day

If I were a preacher I should advise my congregation to attend the performance of "The Witching Hour." If I were a teacher I should take my pupils to see it. If I had growing children I should never let them miss it. It is easy to say that "The Witching Hour" is melodrama. It is almost as easy to prove that "The Witching Hour" is the best kind of melodrama. But it must not be forgotten that "The Witching Hour" is a great deal more. It is a play which inculcates two important lessons. Let there be no misunderstanding. I have no use for the dramatic makeshifts which are constructed for the single purpose of ladling didactic doses across the footlights. They are as repellant as castor oil and unlike castor oil they lack efficacy. But when a play of breathless interest, a play in which gripping situations are developed with consummate dramatic skill—when such a play sends you away from the playhouse with the consciousness that you have had the moral part of you braced up, invigorated, it strikes me that it is disingenuous to give all praise to the writer's art and none to his purpose. Gus Thomas is the dean of our playwrights and it is nothing new for him to display technical mastery in the handling of dramatic situations. All praise to him for his fine art, but why not equal praise for his moral? "Forget his . . . art, but still I love the language of his heart." It is the language of Thomas' heart that appeals to me in "The Witching Hour." Who can leave the theater after witnessing the play without a strengthened realization of the evils of corroding hatred and preying superstition? Hatred and superstition—they are not the vices which reformers love to castigate, perhaps because they are the vices to which reformers are as prone as others; but they are two cankers which are forever ulcerating our pretty civilization and they are the more dangerous because hypocrisy translates hatred into moral indignation and superstition into religion. In "The Witching Hour" hatred has caused a murder before the play commences; it is very nearly the cause of a judicial murder during the progress of the play; and it rears its ugly head for the third time when the youth so nearly condemned to death through the unrelenting hatred of his rival in love grasps eagerly at the opportunity to revenge himself. All this is brought out quite naturally and the audience absorbs the lesson of it almost unconsciously because the author is free from the least suspicion of cant. "Return good for evil"—the lesson is as old as Christianity, but men have been conning it for nigh two thousand years without mastering it. In our time it is particularly distasteful, the Golden Rule having been superseded by the Rule of Gold. I suppose Thomas is likely to be called "old-fashioned" for insisting on it, but Thomas is a man of years and experience and will not be overwhelmed by the stigma. Hand in hand with his lesson on hatred goes his lesson on superstition. I suppose superstition in one form or another enters into nearly all our lives. Many of us wear our superstitions lightly, cultivate them like fads. But how often does it happen that the superstition which is put on gayly like a wreath on the brow, becomes a chain of adamant to bind the soul, particularly through the terrible principle of hereditary influence. As the Supreme Court Justice says in the play, "Medical jurisprudence is full of such cases." Most of us know how certain foolish, sometimes ridiculous, unreasoned beliefs have crushed those who yielded to them, not in ignorance necessarily but in that peculiar morbid weakness which is frequently joined to considerable mental enlightenment. If "The Witching Hour" frees one wretch from the bonds of some superstition every time it is produced what a tremendous amount of good it accomplishes! I suppose these remarks may be construed as a sort of sermon and therefore outside the province of the reviewer of plays. But all of us stray outside our province now and then and during the two occasions that "The Witching Hour" has been presented in this city so much has been said about every other point of the play, that I would rather be sermonical than supererogatory.

Charles Frohman will send "The Dollar Princess" to this city in December. It is accounted one of the biggest of musical hits.

VIOLA ALLEN and JAMES O'NEILL

Two eminent stars who will appear in conjunction with other eminent artists in "The White Sister" at the Savoy Theater.

Stage

"Three Twins" at the Columbia

Theatergoers remember with great satisfaction the production of the musical comedy "Three Twins" given in this city last season. It is said that the piece will be presented next Monday night at the Columbia on a more elaborate scale than before. "Three Twins" is one of the merriest musical comedies that has been produced in years. It has a good plot and many novel features and the music is fascinating. The electrical aerial swing is the largest scenic effect ever staged with the exception of the chariot race in "Ben Hur." The faceograph is another electric effect that helps make "Three Twins" attractive. The costuming is great. The company is headed by Victor Morley and includes Bessie Clifford.

The Scotti-Pasquali Concerts

Manager Will Greenbaum will start his musical season with the Scotti-Pasquali Concert. Either Antonio Scotti or Bernice de Pasquali would be a strong attraction alone; together they are irresistible. Sunday's program includes beautiful duets from "Don Giovanni" and "Barber of Seville," solos from "I Pagliacci," "Faust" and "Don Giovanni" by Scotti and the "Polonaise" from Mignon, a group of classic "lieder" and some old Irish melodies by Pasquali. The second concert will be given Thursday night, October 20, at the Novelty with an entire change of program and among the works to be given are duets from "Marriage of Figaro" and "Don Pasquali." The farewell concert with a special request program will be given at the Columbia on Sunday afternoon, October 23. Already requests have been received for the rarely heard "Aria" from "Son-nambula" which Scotti sang this year in Paris and for the "Mad Scene" in "Hamlet" with which Pasquali scored heavily.

A Collier Play at the Alcazar

"The Patriot," a Willie Collier success that has never been presented on the Pacific Coast, is announced as the Alcazar's next offering, commencing Monday night. It served Collier as a starring vehicle in New York and several other Eastern cities the season before last. In its construction Collier collaborated with J. Hartley Manners and the mingling of their comedy methods resulted in a delightful disturber of the blues. Thurston Hall will be seen in the principal role, the part created by Collier. Bessie Barriscale, Lucile Culver, Louis Bennison, Adle Belgarde, Howard Hickman, Burt Wesner, Grace Barbour, Will R. Walling, Victory Bateman, Walter Belasco, Mrs. Byers and Charles Gunn are also in the cast. Picturesque staging is promised.

Last Week of Bevani Opera

The Bevani Opera Company will begin the seventh and last week of its brilliant and successful engagement at the Garrick Theater next Monday night. The repertoire will be as follows: Monday evening the performance will be for the benefit of the Call's Relief Fund for Mount St. Joseph Orphanage. For this occasion only the performance will consist of "The Love Tales of Hoffman" with Regina Vicarino, Edmee De Dreux, Marie Scherzer, Umberto Sacchetti, Achille Alberti, Joseph Florian and Arthur Mesmer in the cast. Tuesday evening "Cavalleria Rusticana" with Frery, De Dreux, Giuliani and Secci-Corsi followed by "I Pagliacci" with Francini, De Dreux, Battain, Campana and Secci-Corsi. Wednesday evening "La Traviata" with Vicarino, Newcombe, Sacchetti, Alberti and Florian. Thursday evening "Martha" with Francini, De Dreux, Battain, Campana and Florian. Friday evening "Lucia" will be given its last performance with Vicarino, Newcombe, Sacchetti, Alberti and Bevani. For the matinee today (Saturday) "Il Trovatore" will be sung with Frery, Jarman, Sacchetti, Giuliani, Secci-Corsi and Florian. To-night (Saturday) "La Traviata" will be the bill with Vicarino, Battain, Alberti and Giuliani. To-morrow (Sunday) matinee "Martha" will be given and to-morrow (Sunday) night "Aida."

La Tortajada at the Orpheum

The Orpheum bill for next week will be headed by La Tortajada, the famous Spanish beauty and dancer. For her American tour Tortajada has selected a protean operetta which was one of her greatest Parisian triumphs called "Adventure of a Toreador" in which she plays the entire cast of four parts and introduces the Spanish dance which proved one of the greatest theatrical sensations of Europe. John P. Wade, a character actor, will present next week a one-act Southern play called "Marse Shelby's Chicken Dinner." Paul Quinn and Joe Mitchell will appear in their diverting skit, "The Land Agent" which will appeal particularly to those who have dabbled in real estate. The Flying Martins who are known wherever a circus or hippodrome exists are premier double trapeze performers. Their offering is both daring and graceful and will not fail to fascinate the spectators. Next week will be the last of Meyers, Warren and Lyon, The Six Abdallahs, The Joseph Adelman Family and Hal Stephens in his impersonations of famous actors.

Viola Allen at the Savoy

John Mason and his company will make their last appearance at the Savoy this Sunday evening and on Monday night Viola Allen, accompanied by James O'Neill and a great supporting company, including Minna Gale and Henry Stanford, will present, for the first time in San Francisco, "The White Sister." It was one of the last works of Marion Crawford. The story is based upon fact and the characters of the nun and the soldier in "The White Sister" have their flesh and blood prototypes in the real world. The action takes place in Rome. Incidental music for the play was specially composed by William Furst and in the interpretation of the score a quartette of soloists and a well organized chorus is used. Miss Allen's engagement is limited to two weeks, with no performances on Sunday, and Clyde Fitch's last and best play, "The City," will follow at the Savoy.

Oakland To See "Going Some"

The Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will next week give theatergoers across the bay their first opportunity of enjoying "Going Some," the celebrated Paul Armstrong-Rex Beach farce-comedy. This is the comedy which scored such a hit at the Valencia Theater in this city last winter but was not played in Oakland. "Going Some" is a farce-comedy pure and simple with plot and scenes of unusual originality. The cast will include George Friend, Henry Shumer, George Webster, James Gleason, Maribel Seymour, Catherine Calhoun as well as many others equally at home in comedy, and an excellent performance is certain to result. After one week of "Going Some" the company is to be presented in a revival of "Camille" in which Sydney Ayres and Muriel Hope will have the two important roles.

Farewell Day at Idora

Sunday, October 16, is farewell day at Idora Park in Oakland. After the last of the merry-makers has departed, the gates will be closed until the spring of 1911. Sunday will also mark the farewell of Ellery's Royal Italian Band. For his farewell Channing Ellery has arranged two concerts which should prove to be the most interesting the Royal Italian Band has yet rendered.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The rise in the stock market was checked by bankers early in the recent week, especially in the high priced or leading issues, and undoubtedly this was done as a result of the banking situation in New York which at the moment will not allow any expansion of loans for speculative purposes. The reaction, however, was comparatively small. In the later dealings of the week the volume of business dwindled to very small proportions as a result of the lack of interest by insiders who would rather see a marking-to process in the stock market, temporarily at least. There has been very little news bearing on the Wall Street situation and nothing worthy of comment as a market factor. The excellent crop returns for the season or year have been instrumental in creating a fair amount of business throughout the country and with the passing of election day it would appear that confidence will in a measure be restored and a greater volume of trading will be seen. The monthly steel tonnage report showed a decrease of 379,022 tons for the September business, but the steel trade authorities believe that the turn of the corner is not far off and a big business will be looked for from the railroads before the end of the year. We are looking for stock market stability in the immediate future, with the probability of higher prices toward the close of the month.

Wheat—Argentine crop fears checked the decline in wheat last week and accomplished a fair rally in an oversold market. Outside of the Argentine news the gossip was generally bearish. The foreign markets were generally firm and showed some advance, but exporters here said that no business could be done as the foreign bids were about four cents out of line. Receipts, while running less than last year were large enough to take care of the present local demand and stocks are still increasing at the different primary points. The government crop reports will be made public next week and although no great change from last month's figures is expected a good many in the trade are inclined to await these figures before taking a stand. Should they indicate a crop of around 700,000,000 bushels for winter and spring wheat combined it will be difficult to maintain the present price and a drop to around one dollar for May wheat will be in order. The Argentine news will soon be a factor in shaping the trend of values. Already reports of drought are being received and while as yet no damage has actually occurred, if the Argentine does not get rain soon it will be the basis for a quick upturn as professional traders generally are short the market and would quickly change to the buying side. Eliminating the Argentine news we have a very weak wheat situation.

Corn—Trade estimates on corn that have met with popular approval lately indicate that there was an improvement during the month of September of from one to two and one-half points in the crop situation. Such gain would indicate a crop of 2,950,000,000 to 2,985,000,000 bushels, either figure running ahead of the record crop of 1906 which was 2,927,000,000 bushels. Well posted men believe that there is an enormous feeding year ahead, particularly so if corn continues low and hogs and cattle continue high. However, government figures on hogs on the farm do not agree with the estimates of the laymen.

Cotton—The announcement by bankers that no cotton bills of lading will be honored on board ship after October 18 unless accompanied by a banker's guarantee, has probably been the most powerful influence in causing the rapid and sensational advance in cotton during the last week or so. Small crop estimates and the fear of killing frosts due to the sudden drop in temperatures the latter part of the week also contributed to the chaotic conditions but milder weather now prevails throughout the belt and if it continues a few weeks more crop estimates will probably be materially increased. Prospects are unusually bright for record cotton crops in Egypt, India, Russia and China and it is probable that under these circumstances a crop of 12,000,000 bales of American cotton, together with the 782,000 bales carried over at the end of last season, would prove ample to meet all consumption requirements during the remaining ten months of the season. The trade conditions are far from satisfactory in this country and the spinners' takings of American cotton for the first forty days of the season show a falling off of about 200,000 bales when compared with last year.

Local Securities—Taken as a whole the local market for stocks and bonds continues to be a rather dull affair. The chief activity in the stock list for the past week or so has been in the Hawaiian sugar group, wherein early trading declines were shown on account of a weakness in the price of raw sugar. This article has since firmed up slightly and has checked the decline and in some cases brought about a partial recovery. Pacific Telephone common was another active spot on the regular list and, in sympathy with a strong New York market for the shares, made a rapid advance. The real feature of the local market is the extreme demand and small supply of Pacific Gas & Electric common stock. Rumors of dividends soon after the first of the year are now being generally blown around the street on this stock and in view of the credited enormous earnings of the company, it does not look as if these predictions will go amiss. At any rate with local and eastern buyers in the market competing for stocks it is reasonable to suppose that Pacific Gas & Electric common will see very much higher prices shortly. At the regular annual meeting of the Stock and Bond Exchange which was held during the early part of the present week, the secretary's report showed a total business for the fiscal year in both stocks and bonds of $26,962,295.75. This shows an increase over the previous year of $4,625,757.12.

"Hildemann of Prague to the rescue!" suddenly shouted the secretary almost leaping from his armchair.

"Hildemann of Prague!" thundered the director in agreement.

They consulted Prinz as to this idea, and he nodded sombrely.

"Hildemann is good," said Gustave Rietschl, attempting to soothe his friend, to whom the substitution appeared to give uneasiness. "With Hildemann, a rehearsal is quite unnecessary. He is safe; he has acted the role with the best casts; you need not worry about him."

Hildemann agreed to come, and promised to be on hand in good time—shortly before the play began; it was impossible for him to come earlier.

To Prinz the day of the representation was one of excruciating suspense. "I should like to have rehearsed it with him," he said, in the evening, to his dresser as he placed his rapier at his side. Then he strode up and down the dark stage, looking at the still empty house, and came back again to his friend Rietschl, now enveloped in his spectral cloak.

"I feel terribly unstrung—I beg of you, do not leave me."

"No wonder you are unstrung if you feel stage-fright at this late day."

"Stage-fright! I could almost say anguish. Does anyone know whether Hildemann is here yet?"

"I don't know. But he must certainly have come by this time."

Again Prinz wandered on to the dismal empty stage, from the curtain at the edge of the Castle Terrace of Elsinore and back again, as if trying to walk off the terrible loneliness that had invaded his soul. The soldiers of the guard marched in and put their halberds on the painted tower, in order to tug their high boots into place and settle the ruffs on their necks, while Hamlet shuddered at their shadows as if they had crept from some weird, unknown world on to the boards of the stage.

Preparations for the first scene roused him from himself, and with a sudden shock he began to regret the inevitable—his impending role. He began to wonder why he had consented to play his part, full as it was of horror and freighted with such awful recollections; and he hoped to find in the hum and confusion reigning behind the scenes that Hildemann, after all, had failed to come. But, after the first scene, a shadow in the wings awaited him and drew near as he approached.

"Herr Hildemann?"

"Herr Prinz?"

Hamlet's father made a slight jest in allusion to his tardy arrival.

"Oh, I am reliable; when I make a promise, I do not break my word."

"Shall we not try over the last scene quickly?"

"The fencing? It is not necessary. You fence well, and in me you will find that you have an adversary worthy of your steel. It will go all right."

Laertes bade adieu to Polonius and Ophelia. His warning to Hamlet was dry and business-like, yet extraordinarily significant. Then he disappeared, and when Hamlet, who was seized by an intense uneasiness, wished to follow him he could not be found. In the scene with the ghost of his father, Hamlet's heart seemed to turn to water; so vividly the awful memory of the past rose before him that he almost collapsed; his vision swam and strange noises rang in his ears. But the public were carried away by his artistic rendering of the doubt and anguish of Hamlet. They had never seen this great role so marvelously portrayed; they watched with bated breath this revelation of a soul in travail before incomprehensible forces too strong for it to grapple with, and they applauded him rapturously.

Hamlet appeared before the curtain. Deathly white and with shaking hands he bowed his acknowledgments. Then he again sought Hildemann, but fruitlessly. Rietschl had taken off his ghostly cloak and looked like a Bedouin Sheik. He tried to impart some of his own sang froid to his friend by a pressure of his cool hand, but Prinz caught hold of him excitedly.

"Listen to me—listen! That is not Hildemann."

"Isn't it, really? Then who is it, pray?"

"It's not Hildemann; I know him from portraits."

"And I know him personally, and I tell you it is Hildemann."

"Do you not see, man, in God's name, how under his face another face looks out? It's just as if two beings existed in the same person. He struggles with the under one and thrusts it back, but it will come to the surface."

"Have you not, for fear of influenza, been making too free with cognac?"

"For God's sake! Does no one else see it?—see how he hates me? In the scene with Ophelia he gnashed his teeth and his eyes glowed as he spoke to Hamlet. That was not acting—it was hatred itself. And where is he when off the stage? Where does he conceal himself? I beg of you, do not leave me—stay near me. Always near me. I must tell you something awful—I fear—I fear—"

Rietschl began to think that the play would come to an abrupt conclusion. He threw all his

Thousand Oaks

Berkeley

Thirty-five Minutes from San Francisco¹

Thousand Oaks will soon have better transportation facilities than any residence section of Berkeley or Oakland.

The Southern Pacific is spending over $2,000,000 and has a large army of men constructing three lines into the Thousand Oaks district. They have announced that trains will be running in the early spring.

These three lines will have their union station two blocks from Thousand Oaks. At this station you can entrain for San Francisco every 7 or 8 minutes, via three routes and reach the ferry building in 35 minutes.

You can purchase a homesite among the giant oaks and moss covered rocks in this natural park to-day from $25 to $35 a front foot. If the trains were running now, these same homesites would be worth from $60 to $125 a front foot.

The Southern Pacific's three electric lines will make Thousand Oaks a thickly settled community in a few months and values will go even higher than they are in Claremont.

These facts make Thousand Oaks the best investment in California to-day—come out and see the property and you will appreciate this statement.

The Alameda, a continuation of Grove Street, is finished. It forms a fine drive from which to view this magnificent residence park. Come out to-morrow.

We will build for you on easy terms. Phone or write for illustrated literature.

soul into the endeavor to calm his friend. The portrayal of Hamlet continued. He gave the spectacle of a doomed man, who at one moment shrank within himself in silent agony, and the next battered the walls with his fists in fierce despair. The soliloquy, "To be or not to be" wavered between hopeless melancholy and violent rage. The last sentences were uttered laboriously and indistinctly; after the last words were spoken two thin streams of blood ran from the fiercely-bitten lips down the clean-shaven chin. Never before had such a sharp, mocking laugh been heard on the stage; never had such deep and bitter scorn been manifested with such fidelity, and again the audience went into an ecstasy of delight over the genius of Hamlet. The physician, attached to the theater, came, in the entr' acte, on the stage and drew Hamlet to one side.

"You are exhausting yourself. What is the matter with you this evening?"

Prinz laughed, pushed the doctor roughly away and hurried from him, accompanied by his bewildered friend. Again he looked for Hildemann. His agitation began to infect the rest of the players, and as the representation proceeded a presentiment of some impending evil hung over him.

"Look for him—look for him!" cried Hamlet, and the manager and the dressers went in search of the missing Hildemann.

When the time for his appearance came Laertes was promptly in his place and spoke his lines calmly and coolly as if he did not perceive that the others were afraid to stand near him. He planned Hamlet's murder with King Claudius and seemed animated by a secret joy that a long-deferred boon was now within his reach and not to be denied him. Leaning heavily on Rietschl, Hamlet stood behind the scenes and heard the secrets of the plot revealed; he seemed to be listening to unexpected tidings, now being unfolded in his hearing. The play went on with certain delays that Hamlet managed to impose during the entr' actes. These pauses seemed like reprieves to him, as with Rietschl he wandered up and down among the graves that were being prepared for the next scene.

In the graveyard Hamlet and Laertes came into close encounter. This scene intensely agitated the house and they watched its development with deep but suppressed excitement. Hamlet issued from the open grave where he had wrestled with Laertes, with vacant eyes and knees knocking together. A storm of applause burst from the audience, but it was answered only by Laertes, who with his long, loosely-hanging arms and enigmatic smile bowed his acknowledgment. Behind the scenes Hamlet was gripping his friend's arm in a vise-like clutch.

"That is Death!" he gasped. "That is Death!"

"Nonsense, brace up—it will soon be over now."

"It will soon be over—yes, for that is Death. He caught me in his grasp and then let me go. Did you not see how the other face looked out—and as he caught hold of me and held me close, I felt that he did not breathe. He does not breathe, Rietschl!"

"You must go immediately to bed, as soon as this is over," replied his friend. "You are in a fever. This has been too much for you. The recollection is still too strong."

"I tell you," Prinz broke in excitedly, "this Laertes is going to kill me. I will not go on again." The director and the manager came to him and argued with him. Herr Prinz was called.

"Directly," he answered. He grasped his friend by the shoulder and their eyes met. "I must tell you this, before I go. Someone must know—it shall be you. That was not an accident—that time. It was done purposely—murder. Laertes was murdered—I killed him."

"Herr Prinz!"

"Coming." And Hamlet went to meet Horatio in the castle hall. Laertes stood near by in the wing, awaiting his cue. No one saw him, but everyone felt that he was there and that no power could hinder him from appearing when the time came for his part.

Behind Rietschl stood two firemen conversing in a low tone.

"That Hamlet is surely a wonderful actor!"

"Yes, he acts as if for life or death."

Laertes came on the stage, and Rietschl saw how all the others drew away from him, keeping close together, and how they instinctively gathered about Hamlet almost as if he were some prearranged centre of assembling. Slight of form, flexible in movement, Laertes kept smiling his strange smile and it seemed, even to Rietschl, that this could not be Hildemann. He played longingly with the handle of his rapier, and once or twice the thin blade whizzed pliantly in the air, describing writhing curves.

The contest began. The rapiers met and clashed, hissed like snakes and collided in wild thrusts and parries. Like things endued with life, impetuous, furtive, malicious and brutal, they seemed as if wrestling for life or death on the brink of an abyss. Still the clashing went on till the contest became prolonged beyond the time for mere acting and the manager, bewildered, went to confer with Fortinbras. Rietschl, horror-stricken, now perceived that Hamlet was putting forth his whole strength and skill to defend himself against the infuriated thrusts of Laertes. The other players followed this ghastly fight in breathless suspense, while even the supers were aroused to eager animation.

Then Rietschl saw Laertes with a double thrust pierce Hamlet's breast. Smilingly and slowly he withdrew the blade. Hamlet fell to the ground. Then, leaping up, he stretched out his arms wildly as if to grasp his adversary's throat, but staggering, he fell to earth again. He grasped with convulsive fingers at the hem of the queen's robe, then, with the death-rattle gurgling in his throat, turned over on his side.

"Curtain! Curtain!" shouted the manager. The physician and Rietschl ran to the prostrate form. While the manager went before the curtain to beg the audience to disperse, as an accident to one of the performers had interrupted the play, the doctor examined the body of Hamlet. Life had fled.

"Laertes! Laertes! Where is Hildemann?" cried the director. Search was made, but Hildemann had vanished. A messenger bearing a telegram hurried through the crowd of crying women and speechless men. The manager seized the telegram and read it. The train which was to have brought Hildemann had been stopped halfway by an accident to the road. The management were begged, on account of this unavoidable delay, to pardon the non-appearance of Hildemann.

Auto Notes

A large part of the interest taken in the various 1911 models that have reached the local automobile market during the past two or three weeks, has centered in the Lozier which, since its recent arrival here, has been on exhibition at the Pioneer Automobile Company's salesrooms. Although this season's Lozier is offered at a lower price than that of 1910, the machine has many decided improvements both in exterior elegance and construction over the last season's models. While these improvements are rather in the details than in the big essential features they are nevertheless of genuine and easily detected character. The price reductions are $400 for the various four cylinder types and $500 for the six cylinder.

That the Chalmers is to become even a greater factor than ever before in the northern California automobile trade is assured by the announcement just made by the factory through the sales manager W. C. Hood to the effect that every possible effort will be made to see that the Pioneer Automobile Company, the distributors for this territory, have delivery of their allotments on time.

Louis H. Newroth of the Durham Market of this city who is giving his Hudson car hard service in connection with his business, has just advised H. C. McCoy, secretary of the Chanslor & Lyon Motor Supply Co., that the Hartford tires which equip the rear wheels have already gone over ten thousand miles and still seem good for at least five thousand more.

To fully realize the extent of business that the motor car has brought in gasoline engine lubricants one should visit the warehouse maintained by the New York Lubricating Oil Co. in Turk street for Monogram oils. The first and second floors are lined with tier after tier of barrels and cans all filled with this lubricant.

A suitable dumping body has at last been designed for the motor truck and is placed in operation by the firm of contractors, McDonald & Barry, in New York City. This firm has a contract in New York City for hauling coal, ashes, gravel and similar city work and the White Company were asked to design a suitable dumping body which would rapidly handle and make the motor truck feasible and economical. The first truck has now been in operation some two months and according to advices received by C. A. Hawkins, coast manager of the White Company, has proved a revelation in efficiency and economy of operation.

Last week was a particularly good one for White Truck demand. H. E. Daly, assistant Pacific Coast manager of the White Company, reports that he sold two 1500 pound trucks Thursday and three trucks of the same capacity on Friday.

The tire department of the Weinstock-Nichols Company has just increased its force to handle the orders now piling in from all sections of the State for Morgan & Wright Nobby Tread tires.

J. L. Whitmore, manager of the Central Auto Co. of Stockton and agent in that territory for the Pioneer Automobile Company of San Francisco, was in the city recently arranging for a shipment of 1911 Chalmers cars. Other agents from different parts of the State signed up for in excess of 130 Chalmers of 1911 make recently. All declare that this car's Glidden tour success has very materially increased the interest taken in it.

C. A. Hawkins, Pacific Coast manager of the White Company, reports that the Railway Equipment Company and Haradon & Sons, both Portland firms, have taken delivery of White Gasoline trucks. These deliveries bring the White Company's truck sales in that territory up to forty-three.

Steering Wheel

The backbone of Robert Alexander Wason's "Steering Wheel" (if the mixed metaphor will be kindly passed over) is the same as that of Octave Thanet's "Man of the Hour," but with its great difference, that whereas "The Man of the Hour" came near to tragedy, "The Steering Wheel" is a comedy. In each case the story concerns a young man born to wealth and position, inheriting a share in a large steel producing concern but, becoming innoculated with the virus of Socialism, abandoning his class and his interests to take up the cause of his "man and brother" and in each case, learning through experience that the best way to help a cause lies not in leaving the place to which one is born but in doing the best possible where he is. Ivan, the Man of the Hour, separated himself from his family, voluntarily divested himself of every advantage and went down on the ground floor, to work with his hands in the mills and to try to help with his council and his labor, losing every privilege attached to name, wealth and connection. He kept his faith in the cause until he could no longer escape from the conviction that the leaders who preached eloquently to the workmen were themselves indifferent to the lot of the masses provided that they could secure a soft individual berth, and that the workmen had no conception of fairness towards their employers nor faith towards one another, and he slowly climbed back into the place he had left so contemptuously, shorn of his ideals. Richard Bannister, who became the Steering Wheel of a big combine, never really gave up anything. He was an orphan, the pride of a bachelor uncle who had humored all his whims, and now, after graduating from college and spending two years in foreign travel, the elder Bannister was eagerly waiting his return, feeling that the Bannister Steel Plant needed the young blood and he himself was lonely. But young Bannister, enjoying an income of ten thousand dollars a year without an effort to earn it, had become infatuated with theoretic socialism and the man-and-brother doctrine and instead of putting his shoulder to the wheel he brought back with him three choice specimens who had been living at his expense for a twelvemonth, one a French "count" whose stock in trade was his ostentatious abandonment of the title he had never had but who was really a thief; another a German who had a constitutional aversion to manual labor and the third a Russian idealist who had been designed for the priesthood and had failed to connect. This choice moterie was still to be supported at Bannister's expense until they brought about the revolution in which capitalists and capital were to disappear and the proletariat, with no further need or exerting itself was to enjoy the fruits of the earth. In the course of a few days young Bannister succeeded in revolutionizing the household so that it was impossible to get a civil answer or a stroke of work out of any of the servants, while his high-strung and impractical theories so antagonized Bannister Sr. that the house could not hold both. Young Bannister was made aware that until he reached the age of twenty-five he was, as far as his fortune was concerned, the ward of his uncle, and the only income he certainly possessed was the nine hundred dollars a year that he inherited from his mother, but knowing nothing really of the value of money, the youngster flounced off to New York where he set up pretentious offices and pronounced himself as a mechanical engineer and president of the Dickie Nut Lock Company. This nut lock, a device of his own invention, the promising young Socialist had taken care to patent both at home and abroad, and by putting up a big bluff he managed to give the impression that he was overrun with business before the thing was on the market at all. The great rival of the Bannister works was the Burton concern and each, in trying to outdo the other, had run very nearly on the rocks of insolvency. Each had bid on some government contracts but Bannister Sr had specified the Dickie nut lock in his bid. Burton had bid lower and his offer was accepted with the specification that the Dickie should be made use of and as there was a time limit and other contracts were contingent the amateur Socialist held the situation in his own hands and could dictate both ways. The obvious move, when he knew all the cards in the game, was to reconcile Burton and the elder Bannister, and engineer a merger in which, though keeping up an appearance of independence the two plants were consolidated with himself as the president of the combination. Though he flattered himself that he had been something of a martyr to the cause he had embraced, in reality young Bannister had given up nothing at all. He camped out for a few months in his suite of offices and did without expensive cigars, but he never was without his dress suit and the five hundred dollar bull dog never missed his porterhouse steak. His pose of Socialism was the result of idleness and too big an income, and he so readily developed the scheming instincts which have elevated his class that one rather pities the man-and-brother at his mercy, for, as Burton sagaciously remarked, "One good fight with the unions would line him up for the rest of his life." Of course there is a love story, and equally of course there are the usual obstacles. From the Bobbs-Merrill Co.

A Hard Layer

One of President Taft's favorite stories, recently told at an informal dinner in the White House, runs thus:

"A clergyman's little boy was spending the afternoon with the bishop's children.

"At the rectory," said the humble preacher's son, 'we've got a hen that lays an egg every day.'

"Pooh!" said the bishop's boy. 'My father lays a foundation stone once a week.'

Mother—What is that astonishing thing?

Daughter—The rapidity with which he took it up again as soon as we were married.

The United States Motor Company offers strong testimony as to the wonderful work of Ajax products on its winning cars in the Glidden and Munsey events. Read this letter:

"Beg to advise that the Maxwell Car number 25, equipped with your tires, was the winner of the Grand Prize in the 'Munsey Tour,' which covered approximately 1,750 miles through eight states. We wish to advise that your tires have given us uniformly good use not only in this tour but also in the 'Glidden Tour,' where the Maxwells finished with the best team score."

Now comes the great Star Cup 1,675 mile tour, the important event of the West which ended September 8th with only 16 out of 40 starters finishing, in which the Ajax was the only make of tire suffering no blowouts, with seven casings out of twelve carry-

A Prophet of Purity

The Hon. Hiram Johnson came to town last week, and thundered away at the old familiar spook. He was pregnant with defiance, overflowing with denunciation, but with a frugal heed to the topics that it pays to broach and the issues which it is expedient to sequester in the back ground until after the fatal day of November. The platform of his party has narrowed his vista, confined his versatility. Permitted to play on only one note of his loud bassoon, the monotony of his tune is becoming wearisome. Though his lungs are the lungs of the steam siren, few are the inspirations that serve to loose the torrent of his words. He can do little more than try to smother his opponent in a fog of vociferation. The malign Octopus he lambastes with "hard-favored rage," his eye wearing a terrible aspect and prying through the portage of his head, but never a word does he utter on the subject of the suffrage that his party platform gallantly promises to extend to the hobble-skirted and fairest sex. On that kindred topic, Prohibition, which breathes an issue of the most vital importance to the wine-grower and the manufacturers of imprisoned laughter, never a word from the itinerant disciple of the star-eyed goddess. Far be it from us to harbor the suspicion that Mr. Johnson is afraid of the issue. Who that does not know that discretion is the better part of valor? The truth of the matter is that the Prohibitionists know where Mr. Johnson stands. He doesn't need to reassure them. They know that the suffrage plank was inserted in the platform with Mr. Johnson's consent and at the solicitation of some of the active members of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, who have been advised that the triumph of new Republican principles will be followed by the swan-song of the demon. Mr. Johnson enjoys the confidence of all the best people of Los Angeles, of all those righteous individuals, the power of whose virtue is in their flowing locks, whose earnest, sad faces mirror souls that never a wanton transport knows. We have before us a copy of The Searchlight, official organ of the moral crusaders of Los Angeles, edited by the Rev. Ervin S. Chapman, D. D., L. L. D. From an editorial in The Searchlight we learn that the Hon. Hiram Johnson is one of the right kind of people, a gentleman who was nominated for Governor because of "the tremendous force of his personality," a scholarly man "of irreproachable character and life." From the same article we learn that the editor has been watching for years "the surging of the forces in the Golden State intent upon the one great purpose for which we stand—the enactment by the legislature of a county and municipal local option law"; also, "that he predicts a record breaking advance in the work of reform throughout the Golden State during the year 1911." Of course everything depends on the election of Mr. Johnson, who is guaranteed by the puritanical Chester Rowell to approve whatever is done in the interest of society by a Progressive legislature. If all goes well morals a swell as politics will be purified. The demon will be driven out of the State, the raucous cry of the umpire will cease to break the solemn Sabbath stillness, and instead of Sunday vaudeville performances we shall have sacred concerts. Perhaps the good people of San Francisco who have long deplored the corruption and immorality of this Paris of America need not despair. Incurable San Francisco may be destined to receive an effective uplift at the hands of the god-fearing citizens of Los Angeles.

The Premier Social Problem

The social evil is a most disagreeable subject, but this is not a sufficient reason for eschewing it. Reticence can never be listed among the virtues. The Puritan may hide behind a mask of misguided discretion, and persuade himself that a knee is not as decent as a nose, or that modesty is dependent on the length of a garment, but by his mincing diffidence he accomplishes nothing in the cause of virtue. The same is true of those chaste persons who were shocked the other day at the suggestion of Rabbi Meyer with reference to the social evil. Babbi Meyer suggested that instead of trying to exterminate the social evil we should license it, and give it something in the nature of parental recognition, not by way of frank toleration but in the hope of minimizing its ravages. Thereupon it was assumed that he was proposing to compromise with vice. This is a quite silly view to take of the clergyman's proposal. A compromise implies mutual concessions involving partial surrender of principles. Now while to license the social evil is to tolerate it, what else are we doing at present? We certainly are not striving at extirpation. We frown upon the social evil, we detest it, and we treat it as though it were an unconquerable necessity. Instead of suppressing it we drive it into seclusion, into secret haunts where infamies multiply like bacteria in congenial environment. No scientific attempt is made to check the most appalling of plagues in its ravages on the health and morals of the public. Yet there is not a more vital problem pressing for solution. It is a problem that for centuries has engaged the attention and enlisted the sympathy of philanthropists and statesmen. Often it has been thought possible to extirpate the evil by statutory enactments, but experiments have proved the utter fallacy of the judgment that designed them. We know with as much certainty as we can know anything that eradication by compulsory measures is impossible. The lash, the dungeon, the rack and the stake—the terrors of each have been evoked in vain. In this country we have tried to compel women to be virtuous, and we have failed. We have laws against the social evil, but we never enforce them. They serve merely to express a sentiment. Nevertheless we refuse to compromise with vice; we prefer to let it take its course. Is it not an unpleasant commentary on this age of progress, boastful of its philanthropic impulses, that we treat the most unfortunate and miserable members of society as irredeemable outcasts? If a government should be patriarchal in character there should be no human being beyond the parental influence of the State. The most licentious persons are the most in need of good government. Abandoned women are more deserving of reclamation than arid lands. Then why should we hold aloof from them? Why should we not keep in touch with them through some department of government, some institution through which they might be brought in contact with physicians of their own sex, physicians of the soul as well as of the body? According to our present harsh and cruel methods these women, many of whom were born to a life of shame, many of whom were cast into the abyss, are put beyond all hope of succor. What a weight would be lifted from the miserable spirit of some of them if they know that while there was life so also was there the possibility of regeneration dependent on the one condition that they should sin no more? We are not of those that believe that social conditions and physiology must for all time perpetuate the social evil. The antiquity of it does not argue conclusively to us that it must forever be. Christian civilization has not exhausted the potentialities in the refinement of manners. Our nature has not been spiritualized to the utmost degree. The final triumph of Christianity is yet to come. Great as have been the improvements wrought upon individual character we are advancing toward still greater achievements. Mighty slow has been the march of civilization through the centuries. Less than fifty years ago we discovered that slavery, despite its antiquity, was not among the heritages from heathenism that we must always endure. Not many years ago it was almost fashionable for a man to get drunk. Now it is a disgrace. Who knows but that the time may come when men, ashamed to be known as promoters of depravity, accomplices of the vile, will blush at the thought of mingling with the women of their family while reeking of the fumes of the brothel. The idea is far from utopian. But the realization is not to be hastened by treating the social evil as an unspeakable vice and its votaries as beyond redemption, neither to be compassionated nor to be governed. The checking of it is never to be accomplished unless we make of it a live problem, and cultivate in man, the author of it, a sense of his awful responsibility.

When Cheers Are Proposed

The Portuguese Revolution has received the unqualified endorsement of that great apostle of Democracy, the Hon. William R.

earst, who tells us that we ought to be glad when old royalties are shaken down in Europe, and that we ought "to cheer the proclamation of a new European republic." Mr. Hearst is a very enthusiastic republican. The superstition that a republic is an ideal State has a strong hold on the distinguished journalist. And by no means peculiar to Mr. Hearst is this superstition. Indeed in this country of political feuds and factions it is singularly widespread and pernicious despite all the dissatisfaction that exists and all the urgent clamorous demands for the subversion of established institutions. As a matter of fact the form of government is a matter of comparatively little importance. Philosophers and statesmen have had a great deal to say on this subject, but it remained for a poet to frame in a couplet the broadest and truest of all principles pertaining thereto:

For forms of government let fools contest,
That which is best administered is best.

Now at this moment nobody is able to define the place which should be assigned to the Portuguese Revolution as an event in universal history or to predict whether the people will be happier without a king than they were when Manuel was on his throne. And as we have always deemed it unwise to congratulate a man on a blessing before being sure that he has obtained one we consider it somewhat premature to be glad with Mr. Hearst or to cheer with him. Rather are we inclined to suspend our judgment until the first effervescence in Lisbon has subsided, until the liquor is cleared and we can see beneath the troubled and frothy surface. Because the people of Portugal have overthrown a monarchical form of government and substituted a republican, it does not follow as a self-evident proposition that their land is to flow with milk and honey, or that they are about to embrace the freedom that gives enlargement to energy, intellect and virtue. Millennial happiness does not inhere in republics. Neither does liberty, the kind that is worth having, which is accompanied with wisdom and morality. No greater mistake can be made than to classify governments with reference to liberty into monarchies and republics. It is an error in principle. As Edmund Burke has pointed out absolute democracy no more than absolute monarchy is to be reckoned among the legitimate forms of government. Who knows but that the Portuguese are about to experiment with absolute democracy along the lines laid down by Mr. Hearst and other agitators for us to follow? If such be the case, and reliance is to be placed on history, the Portuguese are more to be commiserated than congratulated. Between an absolute monarchy and an absolute democracy there is no difference in ethical character. In one is developed the demagogue, in the other, the court favorite, men that bear a close analogy, one as the flatterer of the sovereign potentate, the other as the flatterer of the sovereign people, each exercising mischievous power in his respective form of government. From Portugal the court favorite has been banished. But before cheering let us see whether he is to be succeeded by the demagogue, and whether conditions are to be propitious for the demagogue's energies and activities.

Republicanism in Theory and Practice

If the people of Portugal now that they have abolished a monarchy, establish an ideal republic, then they will be fit objects of felicitation. But we deem it far from probable that they will succeed where others have failed. In predicting the results of large and general innovations, even the most sagacious politicians have been oftener wrong than right. Even those who are supposed to govern the course of affairs are often utterly ignorant of the direction affairs are really taking. And prescience is never of so little avail as when developments are instigated by the caprice of the multitude. So at this time it is somewhat early to base our reflections with reference to affairs in Portugal on the assumption that the people will improve the character of their government. Moreover it is absurd to take it for granted that excellence is to be found only in republics. Republican principles are beautiful in theory but experience, even such as we have had, teaches that republican government is prone to reflect the whims of the people. Consequently the virtue of republicanism is in a sense the phantom of a deluded imagination. Though in this country we have a pretty good republic, what success it has had so far is rightly to be attributed to the sagacity of the founders and the enlightenment of the people. The people have had sense enough to live almost up to the principles of their constitution. In recent years, owing to a too rapid assimilation of the illiterate, the vicious and the disgruntled from foreign parts, the average of intelligence has been greatly reduced, and now there is earnest widespread demand for innovation. There is more dissatisfaction to the square inch in this country today than was to be found even in Portugal before Manuel took to flight; as much, indeed, as may be found in the Republic of France where an insurrection broke out last week; almost as much as exists in the Republics of Central America where government fluctuates like the weather. Our canting editors and jingo orators are still very proud of our Republic, but nevertheless they would have it revolutionized. Give them all they are asking for, and the result will be a more radical change of government than the Portuguese are likely to get. This is a broad statement, but let us see whether it expands beyond the truth. The founders of this Republic were under no delusion about democracy. They did not suppose that liberty consists in the rule of the majority, or that wherever the people rule there the true spark of liberty has been kindled. They knew that liberty exists only where the people have security for good government, and they knew this security was not to be obtained by government of the public collectively through direct primaries, recalls and referendums. Versed in political science, they were aware that the unrestrained will of uninstructed men can never produce good government, since political questions turn upon considerations of which the mass of mankind are very imperfect judges. So they founded a government on the theory that an enlightened people having ultimate control would perceive the necessity of superior intellect in their servants and be able to exercise their judgment rather upon character and talent than upon the weighty questions of government. They attempted to protect the people from the people. To a certain degree they were successful. But we see that the people have chafed at the restraints that were put on them. The people are demanding more power. They are taking more power. They insist that there is no liberty except in the absolute rule of the majority, and they are striving for the freedom enjoyed by the herd of swine that ran down hill into the sea and were drowned. Everywhere the heresy is propagated that government must be rendered quickly sensitive to the will of the majority in order to insure the liberty of the people. This of course is sublimated and mischievous nonsense. Liberty is not where the majority rules, but where the minority is protected. It was the majority that bade Socrates drink hemlock. The majority has more than once given away liberty to establish despotism, which is something that is not always disguised under the name of New Nationalism. We can never be sure that the opinion of the majority is true. Nearly every opinion held by the majority was once the exclusive conviction of the minority. Every established religion was once a heresy. If the opinion of the majority had always prevailed, Christianity would have been extirpated when Christ was crucified. We have been reciting nothing but platitudes. But they embody propositions that our agitators would ignore, that party platforms already ignore; propositions that were the fundamentals of the philosophy that guided the founders of this nation, who knew that liberty was not to be ensured except by restraints on the capricious will of the majority. Some of them were for making the restraints even more rigorous, but they were forced to make concessions to the comparatively mild democratic spirit that prevailed in their day. And the consequence is that our freedom has been restricted precisely to the extent to which Democracy was given its head. An Englishman living under a constitutional monarchy enjoys an amount of liberty far greater than is enjoyed in this country where we are ruled by public opinion, which, being the voice of the many is the voice of mediocrity. Public opinion is a form of tyranny which John Stuart Mill regarded with as much dread as political despotism. The greatest part of his defense of liberty deals with this insidious species of despotism to which the average mind humbly succumbs, and before which strong minds quail. The proposition which Mr. Mill sought to establish is that society whether acting by legislation or by the influence of public opinion has no right to interfere with the conduct of any individual for his own good. Society may interfere with him for its good, not for his. Now society in this country does exercise the most arbitrary sway over the individual. And so when we ponder the matter we find that there is but a small measure of liberty in this proud kingless nation where Prohibitionists and other fanatics are rampant; where in spots Sabbatarianism is envious of the joy of living; where men are not permitted to attend to their own business, and where the so-called palladiums of our liberties keep the individual constantly in a state of apprehension, and intimidate legislators who would protect the citizen by amending the law of libel. Liberty in this country has come to mean the doing of that which is not forbidden by law or custom, and law and custom are exacting everything but obedience to God. And all the while there is demand that the law be made synonymous with public opinion. It has been asked, How can a people be free that has not learned to be just? Justice is the great and simple principle which is the secret of success in government. The only rational liberty is that which is born of exact justice, and that we can never have while we insist that the ministers of justice shall not be respected for what they ought to be, and demand that the porches of their ears shall ever be accessible to the voice of the multitude. It is because we have all these considerations in view that we are not inclined to jubilation when we hear of the establishment of a new republic.

The Jesuits and Education

A Brief Consideration of Some of the Characteristics and Aims of This Religious Society and an Attempt to Explain the Bitterness of the Attacks to Which it Has Been Subjected During the Portuguese Revolution

By Edward F. O'Day

A little more than one hundred years ago Sebastian Joseph de Carvalho e Mello, Marquis of Pombal, drove the Jesuits from Portugal and confiscated their valuable property. Ruthlessly he sent them forth, the old and feeble professed father as well as the shy and tender novice, hunting them like dogs till many died in their tracks and the rest were glad to escape with a cassock to cover their nakedness and rosary beads to solace their bitter sorrow. As much as the Marquis of Pombal could do to overthrow the system which the Jesuits had built up through more than two centuries of patient yet brilliant endeavor he did with zestful thoroughness, gilding with the riches of his victims the palms of those who were weak enough to scruple at his extreme methods. But the Marquis of Pombal was only mortal after all, and the Society of Jesus, then as now, was an institution of wonderfully powerful organism. What wonder that Portugal, like Spain, France and Italy, clamored for the return of the Jesuits or that the order pieced together the shards of its shattered system and resumed its work as though nothing had happened? What wonder that two Jesuit priests, finding the body of Pombal rotting unburied and dishonored in the crypt of a provincial church, performed the ceremonies of interment and offered prayers to Heaven for the salvation of their enemy? The history of the Jesuits is full of heroic incidents beside which this is a commonplace.

History has dealt with that Marquis of Pombal and dealt with him impartially, for it has measured to him considerable praise and a great deal of censure. Down the vista of one hundred years we see his figure in admirable perspective, but before us, in this year of grace 1910, there is another Marquis of Pombal, his descendant. In this year the Jesuits are once more hounded from Portugal, commanded to leave between two suns that there may be no delay in gobbling their extensive holdings. So far we know little about the revolutionary outrages in Portugal—this Lisbon earthquake which has engulfed monarchy and religion is still to be adequately reported. But this we do know—the Marquis of Pombal was this time on the side of the Jesuits. A despatch says that he was placed under arrest for sheltering them in his palace. Quantum mutatus ab isto! Perhaps he remembered the burial of his ancestor.

It does not require a powerful effort of reasoning to reach the conclusion that an organization like the Society of Jesus which has ever been as distinguished for the implacable enemies as for the friends and followers it has made, must possess characteristics and must be actuated by aims that set it in extraordinary relation to the currents of civilization. From the time that Ignatius, the hero of Pampeluna, laid down his sword to gather a little band of soldiers of Christ about him right down to this year of exceeding enlightenment the Jesuits have been superlatively praised and superlatively execrated. That they should be abused today in the free United States of America where we pride ourselves upon our toleration of every man's religious belief and practice may seem surprising, but it is none the less true. The fact appears to be that there is a deal of religious bigotry slumbering in America which it requires only a little noise to awaken. The noise in Portugal has been sufficient. The Boston Transcript, to cite a single case, is regarded as one of the best edited of American conservative newspapers; yet we find "The Listener" of the Boston Transcript writing thus on October 8:

"Portugal has been as distinguished, too, for enlightened, intrepid advances towards democracy for a hundred and fifty years. She anticipated by a generation the birth of the American republic in the revolt of her great prime minister Pombal against the lethal domination of the Vatican. He anticipated France by a century and a half in expelling the Jesuits. As early as the middle of the eighteenth century he was thus able to improve education and encourage trade and agriculture. . . . It will not do to lump Portugal in with Spain. . . . Spain has never 'shaken' her Jesuits, and the execution of Ferrer, within a year, at their command, seems to show how appallingly the State is dragged down and held back upon the level of the Church before the Reformation."

The language of this passage is typical of the sort of abuse that has been flung upon the Jesuits for centuries; typical too are the errors it contains—when they appear in a paper as notable for accuracy as the Boston Transcript the temptation to call them malicious falsehoods is hard to resist. They are in the same class as the ridiculous stories of bomb-throwing and subterranean arsenals with which the despatches from Lisbon have persistently associated the Jesuits. We might smile at them, dub them ridiculous tales and pass on, if we did not know that they are old, old stories in new dress and if we did not perceive that they are as welcome today as they were when George Borrow wrote "Romany Rye" or Eugene Sue "The Wandering Jew." They are the stories which have given the adjective Jesuitical to the language.

But I did not quote this passage from the Boston Transcript as the basis for a historical refutation of slanders. That work has been done again and again and it may be that some day the truth will overtake and slay the lie, though there is no immediate prospect of that happy event. I quoted the passage for its reference to education.

"The Listener" has discovered, or so he thinks, that Pombal was able to improve Portuguese education once the Jesuits were out of the way. In other words, the Jesuits are charged with hostility to educational advance. No one who has been educated in a Jesuit college can read a statement like that and remain calm. It makes the blood boil to see such wanton disregard of the truth. Opprobrious epithets and exploded slanders harm only those who use them but to put down in black and white that an order which has done more for education than any other factor in modern civilization must be banished from a country before the education of that country can be improved is to commit a monstrous injustice and to lend authority to the propagation of a most noxious lie. And it is the lie which is being retold in Portugal as elsewhere in the Europe of today.

The same lie was current when Bismarck forbade any Jesuit to cross the boundaries of the German Empire. It was current still when the present Kaiser witnessed with alarm the spread of Socialism throughout his dominions. It is told that the Kaiser was lamenting the progress of Socialistic propaganda at a banquet and that a Catholic prelate remarked that he knew a way to check it. "How?" demanded the Kaiser. "Bring the Jesuits back to Germany and let them resume the work of education," was the reply. The Kaiser acted on the suggestion and today the Catholics whom the Jesuits educated are the Center of parliamentary opposition to Socialism. That is the secret of present-day opposition to the Jesuits. As educators they are conservatives. They are the uncompromising foes of anarchy and socialism and all the isms that are rampant in Latin Europe and that are gaining stronger and stronger foothold in Germany, Great Britain and the United States.

Throughout the ages the enemies of the Jesuits have had their pet charges to fling at the order, but it has remained for the present generation to formulate this charge that they repress education. At one time the great Jesuit bugaboo was fashioned out of their philosophical teachings. It was alleged that they taught the pernicious doctrine "that the end justified the means." The charge

Perspective Impressions

In the uproar that was raised this week it became known that Theodore Bell had Hiram Johnson's goat—a fragrant animal.

Johnson's boom in the South exploded synchronously with the dynamite that wrecked General Otis's plant.

The case against the dynamiters is now absolutely Dunne-Lawlor proof. All the evidence is in, but unfortunately the dynamiters are still out.

Says the Chronicle: "Nothing that Colonel Roosevelt has said or done justifies low insinuations against the personal integrity of President Roosevelt." Thus we learn that Mr. Roosevelt's conscience is in the keeping of our esteemed contemporary. O dear Maria!

That there is panic terror in the Spreckels-Older camp is evident from the Boughten Bulletin's frenzied indictment of Theodore Bell. The Democratic candidate is charged with the awful crime of being opposed to the election of Spreckels's kept lawyer.

New York Republicans are flocking to the Democratic standard-bearer on the theory that the election of Stimson would mean a solid delegation for T. R. in 1912. Which reminds us that the Colonel has given his blessing to the attorney who lined his pockets with Western Pacific bonds before getting Dalzell Brown out of jail.

After what happened in Maine, and with Dix in New York, Wilson in New Jersey and Harmon in Ohio all looking like winners, surely the Democrats of California must feel that it behooves them to get this state in line for 1912.

Correspondence

A Question for the Purity Congress

To the Editor of Town Talk, Dear Sir: You cannot imagine with what uneasiness I read in the Chronicle this morning one of the statements made at the Purity Congress yesterday. It was made by Mrs. Della Thompson Lutes who said that the schools of the Pacific Coast were hotbeds of vice and that the thousands of cases of vice in our schools which had been called to her attention appalled her. This is a terrible statement and I have not had a moment's peace since I read it. One of my boys attends a grammar school and the other, with my little girl, a primary school of this city. Of course I cannot allow them to remain in these schools if the statement made by Mrs. Lutes applies to these schools. My children are innocent and I have had absolutely no reason to think that they were being contaminated, but naturally I will take no chances. I love the public schools—I graduated from the old Girls' High—but if they have become hotbeds of vice I will send my children to a private school. What I would like to ask you is simply this—is there any way of finding out just what schools Mrs. Lutes refers to? Of course she must have the facts and if she would only make public the names of the schools which are hotbeds of vice she would gain the everlasting gratitude of hundreds who have the souls of their children to care for. Again I ask, is there any possible way of finding out what schools Mrs. Lutes has in mind?

I remain, respectfully yours,

—A Mother.

Armes and the Women

Dear Town Talk: Please, please, tell me how the attractions for the Greek Theater of the University of California are selected? Raymond Duncan, with his company of Greek players, has been turned down by Professor William Dallam Armes, Chairman of the Music and Dramatic Committee, because, it is said, his production of "Elektra" was not fit for the dignity of the Greek Theater. Isn't it rather strange that Duncan, who is "Greek" to the finger tips and who gives a performance essentially in the Greek spirit, should be denied the use of the theater?

Has Mr. Armes some subtle, keen sense of just what is proper for presentation in the Dionysiac edifice, which has enabled him so successfully to keep his name before the public, or is he merely super-susceptible to the gabble of the dailies? I have always found that he takes a particular delight in introducing theatrical stars whom he invites to lecture at the university. But when Mary Shaw, who has appeared as a lecturer in many of the large colleges in the East, was here a year or so ago, Mr. Armes promptly refused his permission to have the talented woman address the students, not because she could not talk interestingly on Ibsen, Herr Reicher, the great stage director of the Ibsen drama, and the modern drama in general, but—because Mary Shaw was appearing in "Mrs. Warren's Profession"! How shocking that would have been to the co-eds, and their overdeveloped sense of propriety!

But I can understand all that. The thing I am puzzled about now is the standard of propriety by which Mr. Armes recently selected as one of the participants in the Sunday half-hour of music in the Greek Theater a dashing little soprano from an Eddy street cafe.

Now the reason I write to you, Town Talk, is because you seem to know all these prominent people. Usually you are a pretty good psychologist in analysing motives. Please tell me if it is true that William Dallam Armes, through continual association with the bachischen of the genius co-ed, has not absorbed a little of their terror of doing anything "the other girls don't do," or of stepping ever outside the bonds of sweet girlish conventionality. It is said that he gives a course in the "Modern Drama" at the university. I should like to find out through you if it has been properly pasteurized to fit the requirements of the jeune personne.

Please tell me.

—John Fax.

(On the interesting questions propounded by Mr. Fax no light can be thrown by Town Talk. If as he states Mary Shaw was barred from the Greek Theater because she was playing in "Mrs. Warren's Profession" it would be most difficult to speculate to one's satisfaction with reference to the standard by which Mr. Armes judges whether an artist is qualified to appear before the students of the university. As Sara Bernhardt gave a performance in the Greek Theater it is to be presumed that the bars are down in Berkeley, and that Mr. Armes does not exact from genius or talent anything in the nature of a clean bill of morals. A woman may play either in "Mrs. Warren's Profession" or an Eddy street cafe and remain far more acceptable to polite society than the eccentric and unconventional French actress.—Editor Town Talk.)

The Lottery Evil

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: In all that you have said about our new chief of police, Mr. John Seymour, I heartily coincide. I believe he is an honest man. I believe he will do his duty. Therefore I think it worth my while to call his attention through your interesting columns to the lottery grafters now doing business in our city. There is not a more infamous form of vice tolerated in this community. It is tolerated nowhere else in the United States. It is worse than the average gambling game because it is dishonest and because it wields a corrupting influence. It is dishonest because in the case of two lottery companies no drawings are held. These companies are conducting a bunko game. They are robbing the fools that buy their tickets. Their influence is corrupting because they purchase the silence of the newspapers. The authorities are never censured by the pious press for permitting the lottery evil. The newspapers that are intolerant of gambling in Chinatown, which in nowise affects the morals of white people, are always tolerant of the monthly raids on the purses of the poor conducted by the lottery pirates. A notable instance of inconsistency this, explicable on no other hypothesis than that the Chinese gamblers have hitherto corrupted none but the police, whereas the lottery men have corrupted both the police and the press. What a beautiful state of affairs is revealed to us by reason of the immunity granted to the lottery gamblers! What a world of reflections it inspires! Is it not sickening to think that our daily papers on which we have to depend for the criticisms and scoldings without which the behaviour of our public servants would become much worse than it generally is, are so lost to a sense of decency that their silence can be purchased by rascals that prey upon public credulity? Now Mr. Editor, I don't know how you stand on this question, but I've seen so much criticism of the dailies in Town Talk, so many comments on specific examples of their pharisaism that I trust you will give this letter publicity. And I trust also that Chief Seymour will lose no time in driving the pirates out of business. For his information I will state that there are three lottery companies, one with headquarters on Second street and two in large Market street office buildings.

Respectfully,

—C. F. B.

A Spy

By Charles Procope (From the French)

In France, almost in the center of a valley that lies near the German frontier, rises a huge cotton mill. The valley is surrounded on all sides by green hills, many of them crowned with pines and birches. Inside of the factory three hundred women and girls attach the threads to the strident looms, in front of the whirling bobbins. A white cloud of cotton dust falls upon them, powdering their blond and brown hair and their blue, green and pink waists and skirts. Laughing, chattering, their voices often rise above the clatter of the machines. Their mothers and fathers are at work in the fields. The smaller children drive the cattle to the pastures and the mountainside. Their brothers cut wood in the forest. From April to November it was rare that there was any continuous rain; a steady breeze carrying the gray and black clouds far beyond the valley. So six months in the year these young girls labored in a country that was almost magical; the tones of the forest seemed to melt from green into a darker blue as the tops of the trees met the sky line; the green valley lay like an emerald in darker setting of hills and into this certainly the brave knight Lohengrin would some day come, drawn by his swan on the little river that bisected the valley. This the old teacher had seriously promised his scholars when he translated to them the poems of Wagner. He had also taught them that the era of deadly and barbarous wars was forever closed.

The last time, in 1870, the Germans and French had battled in these mountains of Vosges, each trying to triumph over the other, after the manner of the ancient tyrants. Since then both countries had admitted the folly of following instincts which they had inherited from their barbarous ancestors. Thanks be to God, the power of labor, infinitely multiplied and extended by the invention of machinery, had taught man this great and beautiful truth: "It is better to produce than to destroy." Now the laboring men of both nations having ceased to hate each other, would force the kings into an eternal peace. The industrious workmen would unite and form around the world a chain of incorruptible fraternity. He taught his scholars songs of love, peace and friendship between nations, accompanying their voices on an old violin.

One evening when the little weavers were awaiting the coming of Lohengrin, picking daisies and dandelions in the valley or pursuing each other in games on the river banks, one of these songs was heard. The wind brought it from the east where lay Germany. In the cool and intoxicating evening, under a sky that was luminous with the reflected rays of the setting sun, the breeze charged with the odors of new mown hay, the song rising, swelling, echoing, rolled down the valley. On the slopes of the hills, the fathers and mothers were unloading the carts, while the axes of the brothers could still be heard ringing in the forest. An answering song arose from the girls. As that from the east came nearer, male voices were recognized and a troop of men appeared at the hilltop, tall men with blonde beards, smoking long, curved pipes and dressed as workmen.

Anxious and alarmed, the young girls hid themselves while they watched these men pass. Then one of the weavers remembered that the manager of the factory had engaged a number of German mechanics to take charge of the new looms which had been imported from America, for all the mechanics in that part of the country were engaged at work in the city.

The apprentices amused themselves by joining in the refrain of the international song, and when the Germans reached the door of the wine-house the song had been taken up by hundreds of voices. France, by the mouths of the girls and young women, welcomed the strangers, who were to partake of their hospitality and share their bread. On the steps of the schoolhouse, the old teacher stood smiling, his violin in his hand.

The next day the young Germans installed themselves at the American machines and did their work intelligently and honestly. In the evening they smoked their long pipes with their painted porcelain bowls on the bank of the little river.

The warm spring season incited to love. Sunday, they danced in the courtyard of the wine-house, and the blond boys waltzed with the pretty weavers; they knew how to speak so humbly, so sentimentally and even their silences were eloquent.

There was one couple which was envied by all. Hans was admired for his intelligence and his politeness; Violette for her charm and gaiety. He had hair the color of spun gold and eyes that were as blue as a mountain pool; she, under a mass of brown hair, showed a delicate face in which there were two large eyes, black as night. Once in a while when people caught them kissing each other, they felt a thrill of admiration. The old teacher did not scold his little niece Violette very hard, when she came home late, her lips still humid with her lover's kisses.

"And when does the marriage take place?" asked the old man.

"At harvest time, uncle."

"So much the better. Be good until then."

"Hans is a good man, uncle."

"Put some ashes on the fire of your eyes. They flame too much, little one, for any man to be very good, even a German, when he is with you."

"Oh, uncle, you're an old rascal."

About that time those who read the newspapers at the wine-house of Louis, told the others of the threatening difficulties which had arisen in regard to the question of Morocco. One day, the foreman, Dupont, who had won a military medal at Madagascar, read aloud in the court of the factory, an article relating to a large number of horses which the Germans had purchased in Russia for their cavalry, and the veteran called out to Hans and asked him if he really thought France and Germany would come to blows after all. Hans laughed. "All those rumors," he said, "were started by sensational papers and stock brokers, people who wanted to bear stock and buy it up cheap, selling it at a higher price later when the absence of all danger was fully realized." He took the foreman over to the inn and treated him to a glass of foaming beer, and together they drank to the fraternity of nations.

Hans and Violette were too much in love to pay any attention to political affairs. During the evening, when these discussions ran high, they wandered off into the woods, persuaded that Bebel and Jaures, the apostles of Peace, would know how to prevent the capitalists from pushing the countries into a war. That night they wandered deep into the forest and it was late when Violette returned to her home.

The following Sunday Violette got up very early and dressed herself quickly. She wanted to surprise her lover at a place where she knew he often fished for trout, in his leisure moments. She crossed the fields and entered the wood. She begged the birds not to fly away in order that her presence might not be indicated by the noise of their wings. Soon she distinguished the form of Hans through the bushes. She stopped, her heart beating madly. She wondered he could not hear it. Coming closer, very softly, she saw that the fishing pole was lying on the grass, and Hans had a board on his knees which he used when making designs for the machinery. He was drawing and seemed to be absorbed in his work. Then Violette risked one step, then two. A twig broke, but he did not move, for he heard nothing. Then when she was near enough, with one bound she leapt upon him, threw her arms about her lover's neck and covered his face with kisses. He pushed her back with a fearful German oath. Even when he recognized her, his anger was not altogether appeased. Indignantly she drew back.

"What is it so magnificent that you are drawing that you do not want me to look at the picture?"

"Nothing." He picked up the drawing-board upon which there was fastened a sheet of white paper. He tried to hide it but he was not so quick but what Violette saw that it was a map of the valley and an exact plan of the fort. Red lines had been drawn from various parts of the fort to the highest tops of the neighboring hills. Like a flash, she understood.

"Spy! You are a spy! You!"

He turned deadly pale and staggered to his feet. The perspiration ran down his forehead. The expression of scorn in the girl's voice struck him like a whip lash. Suddenly he stopped, took the drawing from the board and tore it into bits. Then he turned to her and said:

"No, Violette—I swear to you—that I am not that—I am not that. Listen—listen—"

But she was suffocating. She withdrew quickly the hand he tried to take.

"Listen! I did not want to do that—But—How can I explain it to you?"

And then in a confused way he tried to tell her in his mixed language of French and German, that he had come there for the purpose of drawing a piece of machinery. But the beauty of the landscape had tempted him; then he had made the plan. He remembered the fears of the foreman in regard to possible complications between the two countries and instinctively he had made some calculations and plans, for he was an artilleryman in a Prussian regiment. The red lines marked the directions in which shells could be sent into the fort most effectively. He was embarrassed, and dared not look her in the face.

"Spy! Spy! You, a Socialist!" murmured Violette. "Spy, you, a workingman!"

He defended himself with the persistency of despair. He pleaded passionately, the tears running down his cheeks.

"It wasn't I who did this. It was another. A man who is my master and whom I must obey. There was another thought probably, the memory of my father who died at the Battle of Gravelotte while attacking your people, for I belong, after all, to that warlike race of Germans who in olden times destroyed the legions of the Latins. Whatever my heart may desire, whatever may be the wish of my whole soul, I am a slave of the past,

Why France Does Not Invest Here

Daniel Guggenheim, president of the American Smelting and Refining Company and head of the varied Guggenheim interests, returned a few days ago from a trip to Europe and brought some interesting information about French investments. He stated that France has to invest nearly upward of $400,000,000 in excess of the money required for the development of her own business. In the last twenty years she has invested upward of $2,000,000,000 in Russian securities. He pointed out the desirability of the United States securing part of the French surplus for foreign investment but stated that there was a distrust of this country in France which prevented her gold from flowing this way. "I learned," he said, "that the French officials were seriously considering the advisability of listing no more American securities on the French Stock Exchange because of the anti-corporation feeling in America which, they claim, is responsible for the serious fluctuation in American securities. These fluctuations made the French investor dissatisfied with his investments and fearful of the ultimate outcome of his principal and he therefore harassed and annoyed the French banker who made the investment for him. Are we not paying a big price because of our agitation against railroads and other corporations?"

Roosevelt and Lorimer, the True Story

What is said to be the real story of the Hamilton Club dinner episode at Chicago with the exact facts as to Theodore Roosevelt's refusal to attend the dinner if Senator Lorimer was to be present was told by an influential Chicago banker who attended the bankers' convention in Los Angeles. "It was on the Roosevelt special train that the Hamilton Club committee first learned that Lorimer's presence at the banquet would be distasteful to the guest of honor," said this banker. "Colonel Roosevelt was going over with an officer of the club the list of guests who had been invited to meet him. He finally asked if Senator Lorimer was going to be there, and, learning that he was, said bluntly that if Lorimer came he (the Colonel) would have to stay away. This placed the committee in a predicament, as Lorimer was a member of the club in good standing, but, on hearing of Colonel Roosevelt's objections, the committee were planning to have Lorimer detained at home and send his regrets. That would have avoided all publicity and saved the club from the unfortunate complications that have nearly disrupted it. On learning that these tactics were in contemplation, however, Colonel Roosevelt insisted upon more vigorous methods. The result was that a telegram was finally written setting forth the circumstances. Even this could have been carried through without noise, if Colonel Roosevelt had not called to the newspapermen in the other end of the car, saying: 'Boys, here is something for you.' Colonel Roosevelt thereupon either read the telegram to the reporters himself, or gave it to them to read, with the result that the affair instantly became sensational and the whole world knew it."

Criticism of British Generals

Colonel Gadke, the German military expert, was present at the recent British maneuvers, and gave it as his opinion that the soldiers were excellent but that the generals did not know their business. Resenting this, English newspapers rejoin that Gadke was on the ground only as a correspondent, not as a military attaché, and could not have known much about the orders actually issued or the strategy attempted. However, the criticism of the foreigner is only about what the average Englishman has been free to say. When unlucky General Buller telegraphed, after his first great defeat in South Africa, "The men are splendid," the general comment was, "Yes, but what about their commanding officers?" It has been supposed that an improvement in command has since been effected, but, short of the test of actual war, the British public will remain a little skeptical about this. If Colonel Gadke had wished to be cruel, he might have added to his strictures by citing the story of Radetsky and the Piedmontese commanders in 1848. The Austrian marshal is said to have issued the order to his sharpshooters: "Pick off their commissioned officers, but spare their generals, for they are useful to me."

Sobriety Growing in England

England's drink bill is actually on the decline. It was in 1899—the year of the opening of the Boer War—that the drink bill reached its high-water mark. The following year the decline commenced, and since then, by steady steps, the expenditure on drink has fallen from over £180,000,000 to £156,000,000, and this in spite of an increasing population. The result is reflected in the convictions for drunkenness. In the five years from 1905 to 1909 the convictions in England and Wales have dropped from 60.66 per 10,000 of the population to 47.41. Nor is this all. The chief cause of grave crimes is drink, and as drink declines the more serious crimes decline also. The reasons for this striking movement are many. Education is beginning to do its work. The people are learning self-control and self-respect. The great increase in the provision of wholesome outdoor pleasures for the people is having its effect. Every public bowling green opened, every bicycle made, every new tram line that is constructed to take people out of the town into the country has its part in the movement. The garden cities and suburbs that are springing up on all hands, the movement back to the land, the enormous development of social regenerative agencies all work to the same good end.

delegates, representing thirty-seven nations, unanimously endorsed the probation system for criminals and warmly recommended its extension by all civilized governments. The congress declared that the effects of probation are beneficial when applied with due regard to the protection of the community in the cases of persons who may reasonably be expected to reform without resort to imprisonment, and when the supervision is by competent officials for a reasonable length of time—limitations everywhere recognized as essential to the success of the system. The congress then went so far as to vote that new laws on this subject should everywhere be introduced and old ones extended, and that each State or country should establish some central State authority to exercise general supervision over the probation work. Finally, the congress voted in favor of probation officers in juvenile courts. Naturally, the American, and particularly the New York delegates were jubilant, for, as is not generally known, probationing of prisoners originated in this country, and the New York State Probation Commission was the first body of its kind the world over. California too is in the vanguard of this great movement.

In the Call of last Sunday the news of Virginia Harned Sothorn's divorce was "freaked" beneath these headlines:

Miss Marlowe Named

From this heading it was to be inferred that Julia Marlowe was co-respondent in the divorce suit. But she was not. Mrs. Sothorn was divorced from her husband on the ground of desertion. The only allusion to Miss Marlowe was contained in an anonymous letter received by Judge Pike, before whom the case was tried, informing him that immediately after the signing of the decree Mr. Sothorn would escort Julia Marlowe to the altar. Judge Pike, it appears, believes that anonymous letters are worthy of preservation and publicity. And likewise it appears that the Call not only takes the same view of the matter, but also conceives that when it is possible to construe an anonymous letter to the injury of a person, especially to the injury of a woman, such construction should be promptly adopted and zealously promulgated. The Call, I believe, is a family journal. I think it ought to be edited by Judge Pike.

Johnsonian Oratory

In his tour of the State the Hon. Hiram Johnson is winning hearts and heads with his impassioned oratory. Wherever he goes the people desert their firesides to pack the town hall. Whatever he says his fascinated audiences applaud to the echo. Even here, in the sophisticated metropolis, his callithumpian elocution is effective. If his periods lack the harmony of the spheres the power of his lungs gives the impression that he is inspired by the ardent sentiments of virtue, self-abnegation and public spirit, and when he sees the air and rolls his eye in fine frenzy, the effect on the masses is galvanic. He enkindles passion even in the apathetic, he excites the patriot to high resolution, he induces that besotting intoxication which verbal magic brings upon the susceptible mind. Nor is it the vulgar alone that he captivates. We have among us Mr. John D. Barry of Boston, author of "Mademoiselle Blanche," "The Princess Margarethe," "The Intriguers," "A Daughter of Thespis," "The Congressman's Wife" and other masterpieces of New England genius of which I have never heard. Presumably Mr. Barry knows oratory when he hears it, and Mr. Barry pays the tribute of his approval to the Johnsonian brand. He tells us in the Boughten Bulletin, which is now the consecrated medium of his burning messages to a grateful world, that he heard Johnson at Dreamland Rink and that "it was a fine speech." "Though I sat at the back of the hall," says Mr. Barry, "I could hear every word"; and he adds, "It said definite things." Whether it was "the back of the hall" or "every word" that said definite things, Mr. Barry does not explain. But perhaps explanation is unnecessary. Suffice it that Hiram meets with John's approval. I am glad to learn that in Boston they judge eloquence by the carrying qualities of the voice. The Boston critic doubtless always sits at the back of the hall with his ear swabbed out for the occasion.

Marketable Patriotism

It is a quite humiliating confession for me to make that I am almost as ignorant of Johnson's orations as of Barry's novels. What I know of Johnson's manner I learned in the police court, where, I am told, he is at his best. Of Barry's I have informed myself through the medium of the Bulletin, in which, I hope, the eminent novelist is at his worst. Of course I am not entirely ignorant of the substance of Johnson's political orations. More or less of this I gather from the abstract and copious chronicles of the times. And I find that the gubernatorial candidate deals with his audiences in the same spirit in which it is his wont to deal with juries—as though they had been impaneled with a view to eliminating as much intelligence as possible and obtaining as large a preponderance as possible of a combination of guillibility and stupidity. Fearing that I may be misunderstood I will here hasten to explain that I am not disposed to question Mr. Johnson's judgment in assuming that his audiences do not represent a high order of intelligence. The truth is I am convinced there is a very small percentage of wisdom in any body of men that hangs for any length of time on the utterances of any job-chaser. Life is so short that no man of intelligence cares to waste any part of it. When he feels the need of diversion he is not likely to seek it at the feet of a purveyor of political flappedoodle intent upon exaggerating his own virtues and decrying the pretensions of his opponent. By such is entertainment provided for the groundlings, not for the wise. And so I have no animadversions to make on the shallowness of Mr. Johnson's harangues. My purpose is only to call attention to a phenomenon, to the receptivity of the mob on which we depend for enlightened government. Mr. Johnson is going about in his characteristic police court manner abusing the man on the other side—and for what? For not having contributed his talents to the graft prosecution. Thus does Mr. Johnson deftly point with pride to himself. He is running for office on his record as a patriot established in connection with the biggest fraud that was ever practiced on a deluded public. And yet his patriotism, sordid in its inspiration, was stimulated by coin and remunerated with coin. There are court records which all the world may read showing that Mr. Johnson demanded and received a fee for all the futile services that he rendered. The facts were elicited from the man that paid the money and by their elicitation Mr. Johnson, who theretofore had been ostentatiously posing as a self-sacrificing, public spirited citizen, was branded as a contemptible fraud. Yet we find him now running for governor, and with the indurate assurance and impudence of a Yankee Cagliostro picturing himself as a sublime and worthy object of public gratitude. That he has yet to be deadcatted is certainly conclusive either of saintly forbearance or infantile credulity.

The Knight Incident

By way of further illustration of Mr. Johnson's conviction that his audiences are easily to be imposed upon consider his arraignment of Mr. George A. Knight immediately after that gentleman declined an invitation to a big feed in honor of the gubernatorial candidate. The story of that incident was given publicity in the daily papers. Mr. Johnson and his political associate realizing the urgent necessity of conciliating as many prominent Republicans as possible and creating the impression that there is harmony in the party, pulled off a love feast in town last week, and invited Mr. Knight, as the representative of the National Republican Committee, to lax his legs beneath the groaning mahogany. He was shrewdly intended to make Mr. Knight the headliner of the occasion. The supposition was that Mr. Knight could be induced to pour back a flood the vapor of adulation that had been stilled for the occasion by the patriots of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League; a supposition that could have been conceived only in the minds of sifty politicians who judge all men by themselves. George Knight is no trimmer. He disdains disguise, he is candid beyond the verge of discretion. He is an incorrigible standpatter, and he doesn't care who knows it. He despises men of the type of Meyer Lissner, Hiram Johnson, Remont Older and Chester Rowell. Their invitation he scorned to accept, and that there should be no misunderstanding he made public his reasons for holding aloof. His letter was a severe blow to the reformers, but Johnson with his characteristic impudence of a police court hysther attempted to dissemble his chagrin by affecting the belief that what had occurred was a triumph for the cause of purity. Within twenty-four hours after Knight snubbed the reformer, Hiram Johnson, addressing an audience of thousands, felicitated the Republican party on having driven the national committeeman from its ranks. On the man whom he had thought to conciliate with a love feast he drooled some of the weak venom which he appears to keep on tap, apparently all unconscious of the ugly bit of self-elevation thus induced by his undisciplined spleen.

The Conversion of Spear

It is supposed that we hate shams and govern our intellectual course by no other aim than the discovery of truth which we all love with the same ardor with which we detest dishonesty and insincerity. In indulging this supposition we are but laying flattering unction to our souls. As a matter of fact in the gross we are "a gaping monster that loves to be deceived and is seldom disappointed." The mountebank of politics is cognizant of this peculiarity of human nature, and he is therefore at little pains to conceal the art of his dissembling. Hiram Johnson in his deceptions is as transparent as a limpid stream. He goes about inveighing publicly against machine politicians, and by no means privately he takes them into partnership. The only outcasts are those that are not sufficiently practical to accept the tempting terms that he offers. No man is anathema until he puts Hiram behind him. The hall-mark of virtue is within reach of every minion of the Octopus to whom the pie-wagon is a desideratum never to be neglected. Take for instance, the Hon. Charley Spear, who managed the Anderson campaign. Charley is practical from the ground up. Toward the end of Governor Pardee's administration when the "Weak Brother" was eager to make his peace with the Octopus, Charley was chosen to conduct negotiations. He was even authorized to talk turkey to Ruef, and he did so, but in vain, for Abe said he wouldn't believe Pardee under oath. In all the State there was not until a few weeks ago a politician more fragrant with the essential oils of the Octopus than the Hon. Charles Spear. But he has been deodorized. The evil spirits have been expelled by that renowned thaumaturgist, the Hon. Hiram Johnson, and the other night, exhaling nothing but the odor of sanctity, Charley presided at a Johnson meeting in Berkeley, and introduced Dr. Burke's attorney to the chaste people of the college town.

"If you refuse me," said the young man, "I shall blow out my brains."

"I'd hate to have you do that," replied the girl, thoughtfully, "and yet it would be a good joke on pa. He says you haven't any, you know."

Henry Miller Wines the Critics

When Maude Allan entertained the dramatic critics of this city from eleven in the evening till five in the morning she established a record for the St. Francis Hotel where the jollification took place. But Henry Miller has broken the record with the aid of these same dramatic critics. His entertainment began at half after ten and lasted till half after five, so he has added a good hour to the endurance feat performed under the auspices of the interpretative dancer. Mr. Miller is fond of the local dramatic critics and the good feeling is reciprocated, so it was with unusual anticipations of a pleasurable session that Al Joy of the Examiner, Ralph Renaud of the Chronicle and Walter Anthony of the Call sat down with Mr. Miller, Frank Morse, his manager and others in the blue and gold room of the St. Francis. Under the influence of an exquisitely selected supper, and wine that was chilled to exactly the proper temperature, the actor and the dramatic critics expanded genially in animated converse. It was a nox ambrosiana. There was the thrust and parry of wit, the crackle of epigram, the music of laughter and—to carry the motif of the piece—the constantly recurring tinkle of glass and the pop of another cork. It had been the intention of the management to stop the hotel elevators between the grey and the blush of Thursday's dawn for purposes of repair, but when the dramatic critics had been prevailed upon to accept Mr. Miller's hospitality for the occasion, instead of cabbaging it to the ends of the town, the management changed its mind. It would never have done to make the dramatic critics climb all those stairs to their rooms!

What They Talked About

I would like to give here the substance of the discussion which enlivened Mr. Miller's hospitable board but space will not permit. Imagine the banquet of Socrates as reported in the Symposium of Plato, imagine Athenaeus reclining among the deipnosophists, imagine Father Prout of Watergrasshill entertaining Sir Walter Scott and you breathe the atmosphere of this feast of reason and flow of soul. Renaud of the Chronicle, considered the highest-browed critic we have, threw old Ibsen into the gathering like an apple of discord and a mighty discussion ensued wherein all the others hammered stoutly at Renaud's defenses without battering them down. But Ibsen was only one subject. It may be confidently stated that all dramatic questions were settled once and for all and that the world need bother its head about them no longer. When the dispute waxed warmest Mr. Miller instructed Mr. Herman Heller who had charge of the music for the affair to render only low dreamy solos so that everybody might hear everybody else talking. The effect was entrancing.

A Miller Witticism

Would that I might tell some of the good things that were said at that board but there is an etiquette about such matters which must be observed. Oh that I might explain, for instance, of whom Mr. Miller was speaking when he referred to a "bizarre star discovered by the tea-drinking Columbuses." But I must be silent. Indeed I must be content with one of Miller's inferior witticisms; one of those inevitable retorts of which an epigrammatist like Mr. Miller is not particularly proud. Dan, the night watchman of the St. Francis, is very bald. A few days ago a wag engaged him in conversation on the subject of the Panama-Pacific Exposition—a subject on which Dan is wonderfully eloquent—and stuck one of the exposition pasters on his glistening pate. Dan was so engrossed in his favorite topic that he was blissfully unconscious of the indignity. He was still full of his subject when Henry Miller entered the hotel and stopped to speak with him. "We're all good boosters for the fair, Mr. Miller," remarked Dan in the course of the chat. "Yes," answered Mr. Miller, glancing at the paster on Dan's dome of thought, "I see you've got it on the brain."

A Suffragette in a Barber Shop

The patrons of the Palace Hotel barber shop who happened to apply for tonsorial attention a few mornings ago received a shock from which they have not yet recovered. When one of the barbers in the softly modulated voice which is de rigueur in the chaste precincts of the Palace Hotel shop dismissed a customer and purred "Next!" a middle-aged woman emerged from behind a widespread newspaper and climbed into the chair. Every lathered head in the shop bobbed forward in amazement at the apparition and if the barbers themselves had not been frozen with astonishment the bloodshed would have been fearful. She was a woman of a severe cast of countenance and a severe cut of dress and her hair was short and gray. Apparently oblivious to the wonder depicted on the staring faces all over the shop she settled back into the chair and in a severe voice demanded that her hair be trimmed. They say that the barber was in a daze throughout the operation and that he never once found his tongue as he scissored the locks of suffrage.

Mrs. Atherton's Plans

Much to the regret of her many friends here Gertrude Atherton left San Francisco last Thursday, and it will probably be a long time before she returns. Her objective point is Europe but she is now in Chicago with Mrs. Fiske and will stay there for some time for the purpose of supervising the production of her recently completed play "Julia France." When the preparations for this production are completed to the satisfaction of Mrs. Atherton and Mrs. Fiske, Mrs. Atherton will go on to New York and without spending any time there will sail for France. She will stay in Paris for most of the winter. Two of her musical friends, Miss Marcia Van Dresser and Miss Gertrude Norman from whom she received a great deal of the inspiration for her novel "Tower of Ivory" have planned a twelve-month's rest in Paris after several seasons of hard work in Germany and Mrs. Atherton looks forward to spending most of her time in their company. Contrary to her usual custom she will not make her residence in Munich during this trip, but later on will make a long journey through Italy. Although Mrs. Atherton has not divulged her literary plans her fictional work so often takes its color from her surroundings that it would not be surprising if her next novel dealt with either Paris or Italy. Meanwhile Mrs. Atherton's daughter Mrs. Russell will close her home in Belvedere and will spend the winter in Santa Barbara where Miss Eleonora King, the sister of Mrs. Pedar Bruguere, will be her guest.

Mrs. Atherton's Play

It needs not the fact that Mrs. Atherton wrote her first play in San Francisco to fill her friends here with lively interest in its forthcoming production. Having achieved international renown by her novels Mrs. Atherton's first essay in dramatic writing is a matter of widespread importance and will help us to decide whether one who has cultivated the novel for many years can turn without disaster to the totally different technique of the theater. From a letter I have just received from Mr. Harrison Grey Fiske I learn that Mrs. Atherton's object in writing "Julia France" was to do the sort of dramatic pioneering which Ibsen accomplished with "A Doll's House." He quotes Mrs. Atherton as saying that "the rapidly developing woman has not been formulated before, but no doubt this is what she is coming to.

There will be plenty of the others left!" Obviously this does not shed much light on the theme of the play but we must rest content with this information for the present.

Mrs. Atherton Differs from the Bulletin

It was amusing, by the way, to read in the Bulletin a few days ago that Mrs. Atherton's first novel "The Doomsman" adumbrated the remarkable qualities which the novelist has displayed in her later and more mature efforts. The Bulletin would have us believe that "The Doomsman" was a masterpiece and that at the time of its publication Mrs. Atherton had little to learn about her art. That the Bulletin has been carried away in its desire to lavish praise may be inferred by anybody who has read "The Doomsman." The book did not prefigure her novelistic skill. Authors are not always competent critics of their own works but it happens that Mrs. Atherton has correctly estimated "The Doomsman." She does not agree with the Bulletin. Only a short time ago, writing to the New York Times about this first effort of her brain, she declared ruthlessly that it "was not worth print and paper, being merely the usual enthusiastic product of raw talent." After all, if one cannot praise discriminately it is better not to praise at all. What value must Mrs. Atherton attach to commendation which is so ill-reasoned as this?

the Purity Congress

Of George Eliot's dictum "The clergy are practically the most irresponsible of talkers," I am reminded by the riot of gratuitous assertions at the session of the Purity Congress by which the Sabbath was broken in this city. To believe that was said by the preachers of purity is to conclude that San Francisco out-Babylons Babylon, and that here in an atmosphere heavy with defiant viciousness are streets lined with Circe's eyes where men transformed into swine wallow in congenial mud. What nasty minds are revealed to us by these zealous pulpiteers! If the health of a soul is to be measured by how much it can feel, its poverty by how little, what should be our estimate of these ministers of God who come to this beautiful city and are sensitive to nothing but a plague spot? Of course it is unnecessary to deny that San Francisco is the most depraved city in America. The clerical disseminators of calumny know that it is not. What they say about San Francisco they say about every city that they visit. Wherever they lift their voices there exists the worst plague spot for the time being, a circumstance that might reasonably give rise to the suspicion that they carry with them the very thing of which they complain, a suspicion that might reasonably justify the barring of them till after fumigation.

Mrs. Lutes' Startling Story

Among the purity crusaders was a woman, Mrs. Della Thompson Lutes, who tells us that she never in her life felt such grief and pain as overcame her when she realized the awful condition of things existing in the public schools of the Pacific Coast. In San Francisco and in Seattle, she said, she had been appalled by the thousands of cases which had been brought before her.

Cases of what? She did not tell us, but she gave a hint of what she meant, for she said that the public schools of the Pacific Coast are hotbeds of vice. In Seattle a horrible state of affairs had been revealed to her, so she said. There the boys and girls of the public schools had "systematically banded together to organize vice, to tell vile stories, to circulate indecent literature and to practice bad habits." I have questioned Mr. Roncovieri, Superintendent of Schools, with reference to Mrs. Lutes' statement, and though he keeps in very close touch with all the schools in the department he knew nothing of any investigation conducted by Mrs. Lutes. He is sure that if she had conducted an inquiry among school children, or that if any teacher had brought cases of depravity before her, he would have heard of what had taken place. He had no hesitancy in pronouncing her assertions false and groundless. I do not know whether Mrs. Lutes conducted an investigation in Seattle, but to me it is incredible that school children anywhere in this country are banded together for the purpose which she describes. Yet it is also hard to believe that any respectable woman would invent a story of the character of the one related by Mrs. Lutes at the Purity Congress. It is a startling, shocking story, and it argues a curious insensibility and callousness on the part of Mrs. Lutes' associates that they should do no more than talk about a matter of such prodigious significance. If there are thousands of school children in two American cities the combined population of which is about three-quarters of a million, who have an appetite for indecent literature and vile stories, and addicted to the habits that such an appetite breeds, then speedy and strenuous efforts should be made to abate the evil. Mrs. Lutes says she has evidence to support her statements. This evidence should be put in the hands of the proper authorities. If there is no such evidence, it is very important that we should be made aware of the fact. It is very important that we should know whether Mrs. Lutes and the Purity Congress are deserving of public confidence or of public execration. Mrs. Lutes should be summoned before a grand jury and compelled to give up or shut up.

Jack Spreckels Corrects

Young Jack Spreckels, the son of John D. Spreckels, went into a tailor shop a few days ago. It was an establishment he had never patronized before and he had his doubts whether the tailor knew him. He priced one piece of tweed and found it would cost seventy dollars—whereat he shook his head. He priced another piece of tweed and found that it would cost seventy-five dollars—and Jack shook his head more vigorously. He priced still another piece of tweed—eighty dollars. "Do you know who I am?" demanded Jack of the tailor. "Mr. John Spreckels," answered the tailor. "Junior," corrected Jack.

A Mot by Otto Wise

Otto Irving Wise is the local attorney for one of the big insurance companies and was trying a fire case a few days ago. A witness was on the stand testifying as to the origin and progress of the blaze. He gave it as his opinion that the fire had not made much headway at a certain hour, so Wise produced a photograph which showed just the contrary state of affairs and asked the witness if he did not think it a good picture of the fire at that particular time. The witness thought it was not. "Ah," said Wise in his most impressive manner, "you think that the photograph flatters the fire."

Genius and the Code

When the muchly heralded genius who cut the Millet "Shepherd"—if it is a Millet—from its frame in the Park Museum gave further evidence of his kleptomaniacal tendency by stealing an armful of saws across the bay, Judge Cabaniss decided to cancel his parole and put him in jail instead of on probation. But the young man's attorney pleaded vociferously for clemency, laying stress upon the genius of the culprit. "I cannot take cognizance of that argument until they put something about genius into the penal code," replied Judge Cabaniss. So the eccentricity of genius will not yet take its place beside dementia Americana as a justification of wrongdoing.

The End of Noah Flood

I suppose I might moralize if I chose concerning the life and death of old Noah Flood, once a lawyer of acknowledged ability and a gentleman of social standing but for many years before his death a derelict tossing on the waves of circumstance. I suppose that I might sermonize with virtuous warmth on the fact that his old friends forsook him when he forsook their ways, but 'tis the manner of the world. Old-timers can still recall his marriage to one of the Dunphys but it is hard to associate the Flood of recent years with the Flood of that early brilliance. The stories that are told of him now have to do with the later years of his unhappy condition; how, for instance, with that pompous dignity of manner that never forsook him he teetered one day into the court room of old Police Judge Campbell while "Black Jack" Coffey was lashing the air with furious gesticulation in the midst of some legal argument. "Your honor," interrupted Flood, with one arm solemnly upraised. Judge Campbell sternly ordered the intruder to preserve the peace of the court room but Flood persisted till he got a hearing. "Your honor," he declared, "I can settle this whole argument quite simply." "Black Jack" Coffey looked at him in surprise and the judge asked curiously: How would you settle it, Mr. Flood?" For answer Flood walked deliberately up to Coffey, lanted a straight right on his chin and put him down for the count. "It is settled, your honor," answered Flood as he bowed and walked out of court. Flood used to enter the county clerk's office once in a while and shout at the top of his voice: "What's my name?" When nobody answered he would continue, still in stentorian tone: Who built the ark? Noah! Why did he build? Flood! Noah Flood! That's my name!"

Griffin Missed the Crowd

Maurice Griffin joined a group of friends in a big hotel bar and it was evident that he was in a dejected mood. When he had quaffed a glass of champagne it seemed that his dejection increased instead of diminishing. As Griffin is not of the melancholy sort one of his companions demanded the cause of his unhappy state of mind. So Griffin explained. It developed that on the previous day, which was Sunday, he had taken elaborate pains to entertain a party of Easterners who were in town for a few hours. There was not much time for sightseeing but the Easterners declared that they would be satisfied with a trip to the ocean. So Griffin gathered them into a big motor car and drove them out through the park to the beach. On the way he expatiated at length on the natural charms of the beach and on the crowds that blackened the sands in family picnic parties every Sunday. It was a charming picture he drew and the Easterners were interested. But when they arrived at the beach there was hardly a soul in sight. Griffin could not understand it. The weather was fair but the usual Sunday crowd was not in evidence. From the Cliff House to the uttermost tavern of the Ocean Boulevard there was scarcely a human being to be seen. It was a phenomenon which Griffin could not explain but which the Easterners thought they could. They doubted Griffin's veracity; they had a notion that he had been drawing the long bow, although they were too polite to say so. So they stiffened and were silent. When he left them their leave-takings were not effusive. And because he had given the impression of being an idle boaster Griffin was as dejected as Antonio in the play. That was the story he poured out to his friends. "Did you take your friends to see the wreck?" inquired one of Griffin's friends. "What wreck?" demanded Griffin. For the first time he learned that the usual beach crowd of twenty thousand or thereabouts had repaired that day to Fort Point to watch the big new British tramp Damara pounding on the rocks. Griffin wishes he could explain to those Easterners but he knows he can't.

THE WHITE GASOLINE TOURING CAR

THE COST OF A CAR

¶ The cost of an automobile is not what you pay for it, or the initial investment—but what it costs to maintain—the number of miles on a gallon of gasoline—the number of miles on a set of tires—the oil bills—the incidental repairs. It is the answer to this question that either makes a car a luxury, afforded by few, or the proper kind of transportation at a reasonable cost.

¶ The White Gasoline Cars have solved these problems economically. A WHITE GASOLINE Car has a four-cylinder motor cast en bloc, which economizes in size and weight—it has extreme length of stroke, which allows the cylinders to be of moderate size. In consequence, the car is of moderate weight and easy on tires—one of the most important items in up-keep.

¶ The car has four forward speeds, a flexibility found only upon the most expensive cars, which allows the engine to run at a speed more economical, and more suited to the purpose of the driver. Again, WHITE CARS are marvels of simplicity, which makes them easy to operate and easy to keep in order.

The Charming Ethel Crocker

Miss Ethel Mary Crocker took apartments at the Fairmont last week to attend the opera where she was greatly admired on Friday night. She is without any doubt a charming girl and very striking in appearance. Tall and well proportioned, she possesses beautiful eyes which she inherited from her mother; her nose has a lovely shape and her ears would make an artist's delight; besides she has a way of carrying her head, which, accompanied by a certain smile of hers, makes her quite bewitching at times. Miss Crocker has had in the way of education all the advantages that money can procure, for Mrs. Crocker, a woman of great intelligence and unbounded generosity, spares nothing when it is a question of the moral or intellectual welfare of her children. Ethel Mary speaks several languages and I know very few women who are as well read in English and would interest more mature intellects, she is always ready to help having a good time and is quite an acquisition in parties, as she is quick at repartee, has a ready wit and a keen sense of humor which causes her to see the funny side of everything. Those who know her from childhood are devoted to her, and are sure of her success in San Francisco society, in which her mother numbers such warm friends, if the charms of the French capital do not call her away too soon.

Vicomtesse de Tristan Coming

Vicomtesse Philippé de Tristan, who was formerly the piquante Josephine de Guigne, will sail from France on the second of November, accompanied by her husband and her two charming small children and will pass the winter in San Mateo. Her sister, Vicomtesse Elie de Dampierre, will not come this year to California as was announced in the local papers, but will divide her time between her Paris residence and the beautiful Chateau de Plassac, the ancestral home of her husband.

Entertaining Secretary Meyer

Mr. and Mrs. Peter Martin gave a dinner last Saturday at the St. Francis in honor of Mr. George von Lengerke Meyer, the Secretary of the Navy. It was a very exclusive little affair, the invited guests being Mr. and Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Henry T. Scott, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Irwin, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Martin, Mr. and Mrs. Willis Polk and Mrs. Robert Oxnard. It might be inferred from this list of dinner guests that the conversation turned on architecture and sugar more than on ships, but I have no doubt that in deference to their distinguished guest the Martins steered the talk into naval channels and kept it there. Let it not be thought that our society men are incapable of talking as brightly of dreadnaughts and superimposed turrets as their wives of hobbles and two-story bonnets. But I would not be surprised if the subject of Hillsboro crept half a dozen times into the conversation, most of those present being much engrossed with that gilded municipality. That it was a thoroughly enjoyable affair there can be no doubt for it was half after nine before the diners arose from the table and started for the theater. The audience at the Columbia was no doubt delighted with the interruption and Mr. George von Lengerke Meyer was allowed to perceive that our society is really at the top-notch of smartness. All smart society regards punctuality as the thief of time.

Mrs. Martin Selling Postal Cards

Speaking of Mrs. Peter Martin reminds me that her experience as a helper in the postal card campaign of the fair boosters was not a particularly happy one. Mrs. Martin, on post card day, sat at a table in the Palace Hotel and waited patiently for customers to buy her wares. Customers were none too numerous and Mrs. Martin had many idle moments during which, to judge from her manner, her thoughts were not superlatively pleasant. Mrs. Martin is not used to inaction and probably voted the whole thing a great bore. When stray members of the vulgus approached to buy her postals, however, she was the most pleasant of saleswomen, the dejection of other moments disappearing in the sunshine of an ingratiating smile.

They Have Invited Twenty-one Hundred

Mr. and Mrs. Carter Pitkin Pomeroy are said to have sent out 2100 invitations for the marriage of their daughter. It is an imposing number. Why it should be I do not know, but when one is told that 2100 cards were mailed one feels the responsibility of being properly impressed. If only twenty-one people were invited including the royal family in England and Mrs. Stuyvesant Fish the guest list ought to be equally imposing.

in French as she is, speaking the latter with a beautiful accent and so readily as to be perfectly at home whenever she is on the continent. Last winter when visiting France she had the opportunity of attending one of the select hunts or "chasses a courre," as the French call them, given by the Dowager Duchess d'Uzes, one of the oldest names in France, in her magnificent forest of Rambouillet, and Miss Ethel Crocker as the guest of honor was presented with the stag's foot according to the old French custom. Speaking of Rambouillet reminds me of the famous Salon Bleu and I cannot but think that she would not have disparaged this brilliant society of yore, this lovely daughter of fair California, as she is so well versed in French, literature and history. Notwithstanding a certain serious turn of mind which enables her to converse on topics which

Miss Stewart Engaged?

From the fact that Miss Frances Stewart is receiving telegrams daily from a young man in the service of the United States Navy, the perspicacious Mrs. Grundy draws the conclusion that an early engagement announcement will be made. The young man is at present in the East but will return to the city some time this coming week. His devotion to Miss Stewart has been remarked for some time. Miss Stewart is the only daughter of Humphrey J. Stewart and an intimate friend of Mrs. J. Oliver Tobin (Constance De Young). Since the death of her mother many years ago Miss Stewart has kept house for her father and has received much praise for her success in the art of cooking.

A Ten Cent Tennis Club

Miss Ethel McAllister, one of the season's debutantes, is the moving spirit in the newly formed Ingleside Tennis Club which consists of twenty youngsters who are still strangers at the formal gatherings of society. The club meets every Tuesday morning at the Park and after playing a few sets the young ladies go to Sutro's for a dip. On Thursdays, they meet at Alta Plaza. The club has quite a long waiting list on which the name of Miss Agnes Tillmann is conspicuous, for the reason, I need not explain, that her father is a millionaire and that millionaires never wait for anything or anybody if they can help themselves. But the most remarkable feature of this little tennis club is the amount of the monthly dues. These amount to neither more nor less than ten cents a month. Think of a club with ten cent dues and a long waiting list, including a millionaire's daughter. It is a combination that cannot be matched anywhere.

Mrs. Gish have a very cosy home at Woodside, just outside of Redwood City, and if plans under consideration turn out happily the home will be brightened by the presence of a child which they intend to adopt. The Trinity parishioners will miss Mrs. Gish's beautiful soprano voice, but Mr. Louis Eaton hopes to supply the deficiency by promoting Miss Virginia Fischer who now sings in the Trinity chorus.

An Engagement in Newspaperdom

When the chubby little god with the bow and arrow invades the local room of a newspaper he brings more excitement than a general alarm of fire. The sporting editor pauses in his analysis of a baseball score to cuss his congratulations, the copy reader becomes embarrassed and drops his cigarette in the paste pot, the rewrite man loses the thread of his participial clause, the office boy whistles and the city editor becomes almost human—for a moment. Only the society editor is perfectly at her ease, for her mind like her typewriter is attuned to marriage phrases. I suppose something of the sort happened in the office of the Call when it became known a few days ago that Miss Margaret Marshall Doyle had plighted her troth to Mr. Raymond S. Harris. Miss Doyle is the charming young woman who does the art criticisms for the Call and does them with critical appreciation. She is the daughter of the late Henry Doyle of San Mateo. The family home is in Hillsboro but the widowed Mrs. Doyle and her children reside in Washington street. Mr. Harris is the son of a well known Sacramento editor, now deceased, and is a Stanford man. In newspaper circles his abilities have won him a high place. Quite recently he left the staff of the Call to join the publicity force of the Panama-Pacific Exposition. The wedding will take place in December or January.

Mrs. Avenali's New Home

As Miss Mary Josselyn stood before the altar, tall, stately and composed while the marriage service was read which made her the wife of Ettore Avenali few would imagine the strenuous weeks the pretty bride had gone through during her engagement period. Aside from the entertaining and round of luncheon and dinner parties previous to the wedding day and the excitement of purchasing her trousseau, she personally attended to the furnishing of her pretty home in San Jose. Every detail was complete by the day of the wedding, all owing to the bride's personal supervision. I'm told the house reflects the greatest credit upon her artistic taste. Young Avenali was indeed born lucky. His bride is beautiful and owns a deal of worldly goods. Mr. Josselyn presented his daughter with a check for one thousand dollars to start her housekeeping. The gifts of friends added to the already exquisitely furnished home, rare rugs and silver ware, so from the drawing room to the kitchen (with the latest improved range) all was in readiness for the bride and groom who immediately went to their own home after the wedding and a few days later left for Del Monte where they will pass the remainder of their honey moon.

The Mooser-Cummings Nuptials

Calvary Presbyterian Church in Fillmore street will be the scene of a large and fashionable wedding on Thursday evening, November 3 when dainty little Miss Louise Mooser, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph H. Mooser, will become the bride of Shelby Cummings, the youngest son of Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Cummings and brother of Earl Cummings, the well known sculptor. The ceremony will take place at half after eight o'clock, Reverend William Rader officiating. The pretty bride comes from an old and prominent family; her late grandfather William Mooser was a pioneer architect of this city whose family are well known in social and business circles. Mrs. George Joerns, wife of Ensign Joerns, U. S. N., will attend the bride as matron of honor. The four bridesmaids will be Miss Aline Mooser, sister of the bride, Miss Ynez Mooser, her cousin, Miss Madeline Cummings, sister of the groom, and Miss Jean St. Germain. Scott Martin will attend the groom as best man while the ushers will be Allie Cerew, H. B. Morrell, Percy Cummings and Harold Knudson. A reception will follow the ceremony at the home of the bride's parents, 2944 Scott street to which only relatives and intimate friends have been invited. After a honey moon trip the couple will reside in an apartment in Bush street which has been handsomely fitted up for the bride.

London Fashions for Men

"Fashion," says Hazlitt, "is the commonplace affectation of what is elegant and refined without any feeling of the essence of it." Despite which I am firmly convinced that men are very nearly as much interested in the latest decrees of fashion as women are. A friend who is just now sojourning in London shares my conviction and in a breezy letter includes these notes on the latest masculine modes: "The frock coat is obsolete here. The swell tailors in Bond street don't even make it—their advice is against it. The morning coat (cutaway) with two buttons in front has taken its place. You remember the international scandal when it was first worn at the marriage of Waldorf-Astor's daughter, by one of the ushers. Opera hats are worn every place of evenings. They went out originally because they implied that the wearers hadn't been asked out to dinner. Of course the silk hat is worn with the morning coat. Londoners are fond of dark clothes. Fancy waistcoats, except knitted ones for motoring or shooting, are not seen in the Picadilly or Regent street shops. Gaiters or spats are never worn except by old fellows. The monocle is seldom seen. There is not much difference between men's clothes here and in the United States, except that they are cut more for the body. Upholstered shoulders and chests stiffened with horse hair and other rah rah effects are not seen. Londoners think they look like Hades and they do."

In the Social Spotlight

The Misses Theresa and Lily Sherwood, the well known mandolin and guitar soloists, have organized a trio in connection with Miss Alice J. Andrews, the talented soprano, and they have been contributing to the success of social functions in the bay towns. They were recently a great hit at the Country Club in San Rafael, and they have been engaged for a number of affairs that are to take place in Oakland during the winter.

Miss Edna Cadwalader will give an hour of music at Century Hall on the evening of Thursday, November 3. She will be assisted by Mr. Frederick McMinn, the baritone and Mr. Frederick Maurer Jr., the pianist. In the list of patronesses are many of the most prominent matrons of the smart set. Tickets may be obtained at Kohler and Chase's or at the hall.

Viola Allen in "The White Sister"

Marion Crawford had a natural gift for story telling and of all his stories those which dealt with modern Rome were the best. He understood the social, political and religious organization of the Eternal City as well as he knew the heights of heroism and the depths of stormy passion which make the chronicles of a Roman family more fascinating than romance. Crawford's Roman stories are full of dramatic episodes. Reading "Saracinesca" or "Takisara" or "Sant' Ilario" one naturally exclaimed, "How splendidly that would go on the stage!" It is easy to lose sight of the distinction between the dramatic force of a novel and the dramatic force of a play, so easy that authors are no doubt surprised when their dramatized best sellers fail on the stage. Nevertheless it seems to me that in the hands of a playwright who knows his craft many of Crawford's Roman stories would make unusually good plays. "The White Sister" is not an unusually good play. Without having read the novel I hazard the guess that it contains a mighty good story. But it looks as though only the skeleton of the story has been transferred to the stage. The play is attenuated; it is thin and weak and therefore incapable of making a vital appeal. Its plot is good, as are all of Crawford's plots, but in the stage version it is not overlaid with that richness of imagination, that abundance of humanity, that wealth of characterization which we associate with Crawford's Romans. To take a single instance, there is a Saracinesca in this play, that Ippolito Saracinesca who was a churchman. It seems that he has reached the dignity of a monsignore at the period with which "The White Sister" deals. Now if there are any characters in Crawford that we know thoroughly, as we know men with whom we have associated for many years, they are the Saracinescas. But the playwright has not availed himself of the opportunity to make Monsignore Saracinesca a distinct personage. He has made him the conventional stage prelate who is forever raising the fingers of his right hand in benediction and mumbling prayers. Aside from the fact that the conventional stage prelate is very unlike the conventional prelate of real life, it must be remembered that no Saracinesca would be a conventional prelate. But the playwright has been content to make him so and James O'Neill cannot be blamed if he makes the character dignified and impressive but nothing more. How different was the prelate that E. M. Holland gave us when Otis Skinner presented Lavedan's "The Duel"! Naturally the character of Sister Giovanni is more carefully drawn. That it is true to life those who know anything about nuns will readily agree. But Sister Giovanni is a young woman who has carried a virginal heart into the cloister. She is as unlike Sister Teresa, for instance, as a girl is unlike a mature woman. Consequently she is incapable of deep passion; her love for the man she thought dead is manifested in maidenly fashion. The character could not well have been drawn otherwise, but it would be much more effective if it had been set in contrast with characters of richer individuality. Even the intriguing countess seems to lack distinction. The whole play exhibits evidences of having been toned down, a process which the playwright probably considered necessary in dealing with so delicate a subject but which a better playwright would have found unnecessary. It is almost superfluous to say that Miss Viola Allen plays the part of the nun beautifully. She is an actress of rare powers, one of the best we have in America. Her voice is an exquisite instrument that responds readily to her emotions, but in this part it does not have to range widely. Nor are the acting demands of the part very great. Miss Allen probably likes to play it because her pale beauty is well set off by the attractive garb and therefore makes an instant appeal to a sympathetic audience. But it is below her powers. The memory of her Viola in "Twelfth Night" is one that I delight to dwell on. It is fixed as firmly in my mind as Miss Annie Russell's Puck and Miss Maude Adams' Peter Pan. There is no danger of its being crowded by the memory of her Sister Giovanni.

Scotti and Pasquali

A most delightful afternoon of song was that which Mr. Will Greenbaum gave us last Sunday at the Columbia where he opened his concert season to a house full of people, people as full of enthusiasm as of the desire to be transported and to express appreciation. There was sympathy between audience and artists from the moment that the first bit of melody rippled over the footlights, and throughout the program the air was vibrant with esthetic emotion. As was to be expected Signor Scotti was given a rousing welcome. The handsome and most popular of baritones has always been a great favorite here as almost everywhere else that he is known, and when he made his appearance last Sunday the greeting he received was one of genuine affection. And when his clear, resonant voice was poured into the eager ears of his audience the thrill of expectation merged into a feeling of the keenest delight. That voice was the same flawless organ which so often kindled enthusiasm and fired the hearts of opera lovers in the glad nights of old when Pacific Heights rolled down to Mission street to be ravished by the great stars of the world of song. And magnetic as ever was the great artist even on the concert stage, devoid though it is of the inspiring accessories of richly mounted operatic productions. Scotti sang for us numbers from roles in which he is famous in all the world's centres of culture, but of course we longed for others. Think of all the new operas San Francisco has never heard, and which are now familiar in Europe and the Eastern American cities! Are we never to hear anything but the "old favorites?" Incidentally, I must observe that Signor Scotti was exceedingly generous. To Mme. Pasquali was allotted a very large share of the program. Most of us wanted to hear more of Scotti. Mme. Pasquali reveals to us a very pleasing personality. She has a good lyric soprano voice, and she sings with taste and every evidence of long, intelligent study. But she is hardly to be ranked with the great song birds of the operatic stage either for quality or artistry. The audience, however, was delighted with her, and especially with her many popular selections as well as with her success in the duets with Scotti. The accompanist was our own contribution—Mr. Fred Maurer, and to him great praise is due, considering that Sunday was the first time that he played for Scotti and Mme. Pasquali. Mr. Maurer is one of the most sympathetic of accompanists, and he has the gift that comes to few great technicians, that of "following" a singer, of all times being in perfect accord with the vocalist.

"Via Wireless" at the Alcazar

"Via Wireless," pronounced by New York critics a great drama of action, will be given its initial presentation here next Monday evening at the Alcazar. It was written by Winchell Smith and Paul Armstrong and throughout last season was a sensation on Broadway on account of its wonderful mechanical and scenic effects and its interesting plot. The "big scene," in which messages are received and sent by wireless operators abroad a steamship which has been driven upon a reef during a storm, is the acme of stage realism. Elizabeth Stewart, Thurston Hall, Howard Hickman, Bessie Barriscale, Thomas Chatterton, Will R. Walling, Charles Gunn, Louis Bennison, Burt Wesner and Adele Belgarde are in the cast.

Violet Romer Will Dance Again

The announcement is made that the young San Franciscan, Miss Violet Romer whose inspirational dancing created a furor when she made her professional debut at the Columbia Theater at a special matinee, will dance once more before leaving for abroad. The great success which attended her former appearance has induced her to make another appearance in a series of dances. The former program included a list of numbers which proved the superb art of Miss Romer and she is to offer, at the coming Friday matinee, October 28, the best of her former program and some numbers in which she has not yet appeared. Those who saw the dancer are proclaiming her as one of the most beautiful of the world's interpretative dancers. She has a wonderful magnetism and her dances are sure to create a sensation abroad.

The Savoy Offerings

The performances of this Saturday afternoon and evening will mark the close of the first week of the engagement of Viola Allen in "The White Sister" at the Savoy. On Sunday night Raymond Duncan and a company of Grecian dramatic artists will produce the "Elektra" of Sophokles and on Monday evening Miss Allen will begin her second and last week. The last performance of "The White Sister" will be given Saturday evening, October 29, and on Sunday, October 30, "The City," Clyde Fitch's last and most remarkable play, will begin an engagement limited to one week.

The Farewell Scotti-De Pasquali Concert

Antonio Scotti and Bernice De Pasquali will give their farewell concert this Sunday afternoon at the Columbia. Scotti will sing "The Credo" from "Otello," the Romanza from Bellini's "La Sonnambula" and Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore." Mme. De Pasquali's numbers will be songs by Mattei and Henschel, the "Aria" from "Il Guarany" by Gomez and Ophelia's Aria from Thomas' "Hamlet." There will again be some of the delightful duets which aroused the audiences to such high pitches of enthusiasm at other Scotti-De Pasquali concerts.

Last Week of "Three Twins"

Pretty girls, clever comedians, unusually gorgeous electrical effects and magnificent costuming are some of the features of "Three Twins," now holding forth at the Columbia. The engagement of this musical comedy hit is to extend throughout this and next week, Sundays included. Matinees are given on Wednesdays and Saturdays. Victor Morley, Bessie Clifford and a host of other clever people appear in the leading roles. Bessie Clifford as the Yama Yama girl sings and dances her way into the hearts of every one.

The Gadski Concerts

Mme. Johanna Gadski, the greatest living Wagnerian soprano, is announced for three concerts, the dates being Sunday afternoon, November 6 and 13 at the Columbia and Thursday night, November 10 at the Novelty. Manager Greenbaum announces that out of some fifty or sixty numbers she is to give, not half a dozen have appeared on her previous programs. At each of the three concerts she will sing selections from the Wagner Trilogy. At the opening concert the numbers will be from "Die Walkure"; at the second from "Siegfried" and at the last from "Gottterdammerung." Mr. Edwin Schneider, the composer-pianist, will be the assisting artist.

What the Orpheum Offers

Miss Augusta Glose will present her pianologue, spoken songs and imitations of types at the Orpheum next week. Miss Glose is young, pretty and fascinating and an artiste in the truest sense of the word. Spissell Bros. and Company will introduce their novel and original pantomime comedy, "The Continental Waiter," the idea of which was conceived by Frank Spissell in Europe seven years ago and was suggested by the antics of a waiter in a Bohemian restaurant in Vienna. Leona Thurber and Harry Madison will appear in an unconventional skit called "On a Shopping Tour" which consists of dialogue, song and dance. Miss Thurber is a strikingly handsome woman who dresses modishly while Mr. Thurber excels as an acrobatic dancing comedian. William Fle-men and his company are expected to score heavily in a sketch by Victor Smalley called "Back to Boston." It is a romantic little thing set to slang and concerns the short love affair of a pugilist.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There is little to be said as a commentary on the Wall Street situation other than what we have said heretofore. The chief factors for the advance which has been instituted by the most powerful bankers in New York, have been: the magnificent crops which are now harvested; the adjudication of the railroad rate situation by which it is now known that the moderate increases in the tariff, for tonnage, will be allowed; the delay in bringing the Government suits against the Standard Oil and tobacco companies until next year; and lastly, the probability of a political landslide against Roosevelt. This latter factor, however, we believe is of less consequence, as there will be tranquility in the political world for at least one year after November 8. We are expecting higher prices all around in stocks before there is a culmination in the present movement, but we advise conservatism now in making commitments in view of the important rise in values.

Wheat—Dragging markets were seen nearly all of last week, although there was more tendency to recovery than during the previous week. Wheat sold to the lowest figure since harvest time, although not so low as in June, when the trade was feeling the ill effects of the liquidation following the Kansas crop scare boom that came early in the year. Except for a technical speculative situation in the wheat trade, there is as yet no prospect of important changes in the general outlook. Popular sentiment has become so universally bearish that it is highly probable that the short interest is overgrown and unwieldy and there is every reason to believe that the long interests are sufficiently strong and concentrated to force a temporary advance. Nevertheless, there are a large number of hedges out in the pit against wheat and flour holdings everywhere, and it is not likely that a commercial demand sufficiently strong to cause their liquidation will result. Meanwhile primary receipts are running low, the first step toward better things, but the total for the first fifteen weeks of the crop is still about 4,000,000 bushels greater than one year ago.

Corn—Corn has suffered all week from the Government figures, showing the largest yield ever reported; the fine weather for perfectly maturing the crop and the indifference of the Eastern and other buyers. The situation in comparison with the high prices of recent years appears an unpleasant one for the corn grower to face, except where he has plenty of live stock in shape for speedy fattening. It seems almost inevitable that the corn surplus, above farm and commercial distributors' needs, must go for export. A little export business is being done daily and it is to be hoped that there will be a big supply available at the seaboard before the close of lake navigation, after which transportation obstacles might be serious.

Cotton—Last season spinners refused to believe the small crop estimates and bought their supplies from hand to mouth with the result that the longer they delayed the more they were finally forced to pay. It is therefore not at all surprising to find them accepting 10,500,000 bales crop estimates unreservedly and blindly rushing to the other extreme at the very opening of the present season, not even waiting for frost to fall so that an intelligent estimate of the yield can be made. There is no reasonable basis upon which the statisticians can figure a crop of less than 12,000,000 bales when the acreage of 33,196,000 is taken into consideration, as the October Bureau indicated a probable yield of about 12,600,000 bales on the basis of a ten year average. The average price of cotton last year was about 14 cents per pound against its present price of about 15 cents in the face of a prospective supply of all kinds approximately 3,000,000 bales greater than last season, and as cotton goods are still selling on a basis of little if any above 12 cent cotton, we can see no legitimate basis for the present advance which has already placed this staple nearly two cents per pound above the highest prices for this time in over thirty years.

Local Securities—There is very little news in the local investment market outside of a continued small business and a marked steadiness in prices. As was foreseen last week, Pacific Gas & Electric common had a sharp rise to new high levels but at this writing has somewhat lost steam, chiefly it is thought, on a logical reaction more than from any development in the corporation's affairs. The balance of the stocks and bonds are practically without feature. There is a noticeable demand from Eastern sources for California power stocks and bonds.

is as dead as a door nail today and there is no danger of their enemies reviving it, for their enemies are not interested in abstruse philosophical or theological discussions. At another time it was charged that the Jesuits possessed too much power. There was a good deal of truth in that charge, for the Jesuits once wielded more temporal influence in Europe than was consistent with their spiritual aims, but it is significant that their property was generally taken away from them at the same time as their power. But in the past nobody who spoke with any sort of authority ever dreamed of accusing the Jesuits of repressing the spread of education. Lord Bacon certainly had no such notion for he wrote: "As regards teaching, this is the sum of all direction—take example by the schools of the Jesuits, for better do not exist. When I look at the diligence and activity of the Jesuits, both in imparting knowledge and moulding the heart, I think of the exclamation of Agesilaus concerning Pharnabazus, 'Since thou art so noble, I would thou wert on our side.'"

Nor had Frederick II of Prussia, for when the Jesuits were driven from other countries they found refuge in his kingdom. "I see in them," he wrote to D'Alembert, "only men of letters, whom it would be very difficult to replace for the education of youth. It is this important object which makes them necessary for me." And in the further words of this shrewd monarch there is a warning which might well be addressed to the new republic of Portugal: "In time you will experience in France the effects of the destruction of this famous Society; and during the first years especially, the education of youth will suffer."

It is not difficult to multiply quotations of this sort from authors who cannot be suspected of religious sympathy for the Jesuits. Macaulay's tribute is more or less familiar:

"Before the Order had existed a hundred years, it had filled the whole world with memorials of great things done and suffered for the faith. No religious community could produce a list of men so variously distinguished; none had extended its operations over so vast a space; yet in none had there ever been such perfect unity of feeling and action. There was no region of the globe, no walk of speculative or of active life, in which Jesuits were not to be found. They guided the counsels of Kings. They deciphered Latin inscriptions. They observed the motions of Jupiter's satellites. They published whole libraries, controversy, casuistry, history, treatises on optics, Alcaic odes, editions of the fathers, madrigals, catechisms, and lampoons. The liberal education of youth passed almost entirely into their hands, and was conducted by them with conspicuous ability. They appear to have discovered the precise point to which intellectual culture can be carried without risk of intellectual emancipation. Enmity itself was compelled to own that, in the art of managing and forming the tender mind, they had no equals. . . . They wandered to countries which neither mercantile avidity nor liberal curiosity had ever impelled any stranger to explore. They were to be found in the garb of Mandarins, superintending the observatory at Peking. They were to be found, spade in hand, teaching the rudiments of agriculture to the savages of Paraguay."

Sir James Mackintosh dwells on the same theme: "They cultivate polite literature with splendid success; they were the earliest, and perhaps, the most extensive reformers of European education, which, in their schools made a larger stride than it has at any succeeding moment; and by the just reputation of their learning, as well as by the weapons with which it has armed them, they were enabled to carry on a vigorous contest against the most learned impugnors of the authority of the Church."

I might quote other Protestant authors from Grotius and Leibnitz to Hallam and our own historian Bancroft, if it were necessary. I might quote Voltaire who like Diderot was educated in a Jesuit college and never ceased to regard the Jesuits with respect and admiration. Voltaire and Diderot, it is true, did not adhere to the teachings which they imbibed from the Jesuits; but is not that a proof that the Jesuits do not enslave the mind? When these men cast aside the principles and dogmas they had learned from the Jesuits their Jesuit-trained minds possessed the vigor which made them leaders of speculation and scepticism, to say nothing of their purely literary gifts.

In former ages the Jesuits were fought because they stood in the path of the evildoer. They were assailed because they stood for conscience. Nowhere was this made more apparent than in the New World and those who desire enlightenment on the cause of the persecution of the Jesuits in Spain and Portugal may find it in the pages of "A Vanished Arcadia," R. B. Cunningham-Graham's book on the Jesuits in Paraguay. This non-Catholic writer shows how the Jesuits stood between the Indians of South America and the Spaniards and Portuguese who were exploiting them. Slavery, cruelty and licentiousness they opposed in the face of overwhelming odds. Their heroic efforts to uplift the unfortunate natives went hand in hand with their heroic efforts to restrain the brutal settlers. When the Indians suffered they suffered with them, when the Indians were enslaved they followed them into bondage and all the time they raised their voices against the viciousness of the enslavers. They left their impress upon the civilization of South America—their mission settlements are now flourishing cities—but they were a thorn in the side of the settlers and these settlers, being the agents of Spaniards of wealth and power, saw to it that their ministrations should be discontinued.

The enemies of the Jesuits today are using different weapons, but it is the same old fight. The Socialists see in the Jesuits their most dangerous, their most uncompromising foe. Wherever the influence of the Jesuits is felt the socialistic propaganda languishes. In the lecture hall, in the pulpit, in the confessional, in public prints and in private assemblages the voice of the Jesuit is raised against the Socialist. So if Socialism is to master Europe the Jesuits must be silenced; if the younger generation is to grow up in the Socialistic cult the Jesuits must be debarred from teaching. Not daring to acknowledge that they fear the influence of Jesuit training or that they are powerless to combat their anti-socialistic arguments the Socialists enlist the assistance of greed and religious bigotry in their cause and the result is what we have recently seen in Portugal.

The gentle scholars who take the same delight in unfolding the mind of youth that a mother finds in teaching her first born to speak, who study the student as the astronomer studies the stars, patiently, reverently and eagerly, who know how to encourage the slow and to check the impetuous, who can make a syllogism almost as interesting as a passage in Homer—these men are hunted from their colleges and the credulous are told that they must go in order that education may advance! Could a greater insult be put upon intelligence? In the heat of Portuguese revolution the argument may gain plausibility from the passions of partisans but when it gains currency in the United States where zeal for education is widespread and the educational work of the Jesuits well known, one is tempted to indulge in cynical reflections.

She turned to a tree and placing her arms against it hid her face, that he might not see her suffering. When she looked up, Hans had gone.

Violette went back to her uncle's house, mute, stunned, terrified. The following day the German workmen left the factory under pretext of a strike. And as they went up the hill toward the east no songs cheered their departure. The girls at the looms were very quiet.

They had no hope now but in the marvelous land they could see through the large windows, and the forest of green and gold, in the valley that was like an emerald.

Auto Notes

With winter coming on, the motorist immediately begins to think about Non-Skid devices for his automobile, and it might be well to mention to the readers of this paper, that among many of the Non-Skid tires now on the market, there is one that is worthy of special consideration. This tire is manufactured by the Ajax-Grieb Rubber Co., Trenton, N. J., and known as the Ajax Heavy Tread Non-Skid tire. This tire is a somewhat heavier tread than the smooth type and has a series of diamond shaped protrusions which, when passing over the pavement, by the weight of the car form a suction and prevent it from skidding, no matter how smooth or slippery the pavement may be. By the use of this tire a man saves the price of a couple of pair of chain grips, not to speak of the annoyance of having to put on and take off these grips in the rainy season. Another feature of the Ajax tire is that it is the only tire on the market today that gives a guarantee theirs for 3,500 miles. Needless to say at the present price of tires this 40 per cent additional mileage is well worth considering. The Ajax-Grieb Rubber Co. have branches in Los Angeles, Portland and Seattle, the headquarters in this city being located at 544 Van Ness avenue.

Among the 1911 models that are creating a sensation in local automobile circles are the Hupmobile coupes which made their first appearance here but a few weeks ago. In point of elegance these small coupes are the most unique development of the season and in consequence are experiencing a big demand. Their inside drive feature combined with the abundant window space both in front and to the side make them ideal winter cars for general utility work, and, because of the small cost at which they can be run, they are sure to find wide use as auxiliary cars to high powered limousines.

Important contributions are constantly being made to the science of applied mechanics, chemistry and electricity by experts inspired to extraordinary effort by the demands of automobile manufacturers aiming to perfect their cars. Several advanced students in these branches have left their respective universities to make a special study of the testing laboratory maintained by Thomas B. Jeffery & Company for accurately determining the quality and capacity of Rambler motors and other parts. At the same time they will study those chemical tests of quality and physical tests of strength by which the tenacity and wearing qualities of Rambler materials are determined. A building covering two acres is devoted to these Rambler tests.

A car not credited with a clean score, but one nevertheless the performance of which over the Sierra grades on the Lake Tahoe endurance run was of most remarkable character, was the White Gasoline car driven by C. A. Hawkins, Pacific Coast manager of the White Company. This machine completed the trip to Lake Tahoe, keeping well within the schedule, and had all but finished the return with an absolutely clean score, when eight miles the other side of Livermore it skidded on a wet dirt track and went over an embankment.

Thirty-six Hupmobiles are en route from the factory, according to S. G. Chapman of the local Hupmobile agency. This little car seems to be getting more and more popular and the local sales manager has no difficulty in disposing of all the cars he can get.

Several local enthusiasts will welcome the news that six Oakland 30's have arrived from the factory. S. G. Chapman said when asked concerning this car: "There is only one trouble at hand now and that is, we have difficulty in supplying the demand for Oakland cars."

Letters

A Travel Book Published Here

Although Agness Greene Foster, author of "By the Way" has put a great deal of her individuality—and she must be a charming woman—into her book, her obiter dicta of travel in Europe are principally valuable as hints for less experienced sightseers. "By the Way" does not enter into competition with the indispensable Baedekers but it tells many things of which those fortunate enough to make a tour of Europe will quickly and gratefully avail themselves. The book takes us through parts of Great Britain and Ireland, France, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Greece and Turkey. It is a beautifully made little volume, as might be expected, since Paul Elder and Company are the publishers, and it is illustrated by a fine series of photographs artistically reproduced. The author is what might be termed a "corroborative traveler"—she has read the standard authors who have described the countries which she has toured and her delight in finding things as those authors wrote of them is almost naive. As the book is made up from letters which she wrote during her travels it is gossipy and easily read but at the same time shows the hastiness of statement and the ignoring of details which are the usual characteristics of letters written by any but the most conscientious and patient correspondents. Mrs. Foster is nothing if not patriotic. Speaking of the Fourth of July commemoration in London she says: "The men of other nations uncovered their heads in respectful acknowledgment of the fact that they stood before the representatives of the truest and most patriotic country on earth." And again: "It is a mistaken idea that the English people sneer at or slight Americans. Every well-informed Englishman acknowledges the United States to be the most progressive nation on earth." Some times one wonders whether Mrs. Foster is poking fun as when she writes: "Edinburgh is rich in landmarks, in spite of the fact that it has been burned to the ground twice since 1300." Irishmen will glow to read this: "Will you believe me when I tell you that nowhere in Europe have I seen more lovely or better dressed women than right here on Sackville Street? . . . The Irish woman is always in good form. One never sees her wearing any sort of jewelry before luncheon. She is usually found in the morning in a short, tailored skirt, a chic blouse and hat; some dainty confection of lace and muslin in the afternoon; and, almost without exception, the middle class, as well as the gentry, 'dress' for dinner; then it is one sees the beautiful jewels handed down by their forebears." Of the Mediterranean Mrs. Foster says in her amusing corroborative manner: "All that has been said about the blue Mediterranean is true. It is blue as nothing else is." Some of her statements take the breath away: "It (the 'Aurora' of Guido Reni) is the greatest painting that has been done in the last two hundred years." "By the Way" should prove a very acceptable gift to a San Franciscan starting for Europe. It would be much more profitable reading than the best-sellers with which the tedium of the trip across the continent is usually soothed. And on the way across the ocean it could be referred to again and again.

A Fight for a Cannibal Maid

A Cannibal Maid and her Hottentot Blade,
They met in a rocky defile;
A gay eagle plume was his only costume,
Together they strolled, and his passion he told,
In pleading and tremulous tone,
While softly they trod on the blossom-strewn sod,
And spooned in the twilight alone.

Then sweetly she sighed, as she shyly replied,
With tender and fairy-like mien;
She murmured the word, when a war-whoop was heard,
A rival had burst on the scene.

A savage Zulu to the trysting placé drew,
Demanding his cannibal bride;
But the Hottentot said, with a toss of his head,
"I'll have thy degenerate hide."

The Hottentot flew at the savage Zulu,
The Zulu he went for the Blade,
And fiercely they vied in their strength and their pride,

And fought for the Cannibal Maid.
She sat on a stone with a shapely shin-bone
Clasped tight in her tapering arms,
And watched the hair fly with a love-laden eye,
While the warriors fought for her charms.

When fiercer they fought and the ringing blows caught,
With parry and thrust fine to see,

She said, with a smile, "In a very short while
I shall have those two fellows for tea."
The purple blood flows from the Hottentot's nose,

The Zulu is struck by the Blade;
Then each of them sighed, and gasping—they died,
Looking still on the Cannibal Maid.

She made a nice stew of the savage Zulu,
And scrambled the Hottentot's brains;
'Twas a dainty menu, when the cooking was through,

And she dined on her lovers' remains.
The savage Zulu and the Hottentot, too,
Both sleep in a cannibal tomb;

The three were made one, and the story is done—
The maiden strolled off in the gloom.

Your Questions Answered

Question—Is there any property about the bay similar to Thousand Oaks?

Answer—Piedmont, Claremont and Presidio Terrace are the same high class property, but none of them approach Thousand Oaks in natural beauty. We know of no other property which is covered with oak trees and moss grown rocks as you find at this delightful spot. There are no other oak trees in the immediate neighborhood of Thousand Oaks—nature seems to have grouped them upon this one spot. Other properties have a similar view of the bay, but from none of them is the panorama so extensive.

Question—Has home building begun in Thousand Oaks?

Answer—It has, and most substantially. Several homes are about completed, two of them costing $8,500 and another $6,500. Others ranging from $6,000 to $12,000 are to be started at once. Beautiful effects are being obtained by building among the picturesque oaks. The advantage of erecting a home in Thousand Oaks now is that it will be ready for occupancy by the time the Southern Pacific electric trains begin running in the spring.

Question—What are the building restrictions in this property?

Answer—No residence can cost less than $3,000. Stores, flats, apartments, double houses, and houses-in-the-rear are prohibited. Only one house can be built upon a homestead. Thousand Oaks is entirely surrounded by highly restricted property—our Arlington Heights to the east having a $10,000 restriction.

Thousand Oaks is now selling at $25 to $35 a front foot. After the trains start it will soon be selling at $75 to $125. See this property at once.

When she gives the older children a warm bath and cold sponge in the evening, again she uses the heater if the bathroom is not warm enough.

The trained nurse is always glad to see a Perfection Oil Heater in a home where she is called. She knows that if it is required, she can quickly raise the temperature of the sick room without annoyance to the patient of smoke or odor if there is a Perfection Oil Heater in the home.

An indicator shows the amount of oil in the font. Filler-cap does not screw on; but is put in like a cork in a bottle, and is attached by a chain. An automatic-locking flame spreader prevents the wick from being turned high enough to smoke, and is easy to remove and drop back so that it can be cleaned in an instant.

The burner body or gallery cannot become wedged, and can be unscrewed in an instant for rewicking. Finished in japan or nickel; strong, durable, well-made; built for service, and yet light and ornamental. Has a cool handle and a damper top.

When Personalities Are Justifiable

It gives us great pleasure to discuss the sentiments contained in the following letter:

Editor Town Talk: Why add to the embitterment of a deplorably rancorous campaign with the vocabulary of oburgation and invective? We all know that Mr. Johnson was Dalzell Brown's attorney, but what of that? And though he was compensated for his work as a prosecutor of grafters, what of that? Mr. Johnson is a candidate for Governor on an anti-railroad platform. He has made the issue. It's an important one to the people of the State. Let's stick to that and cut out the personalities. You can be forceful and logical without being intemperate, and you are much more entertaining when your feelings are under restraint. I am not a Johnson partisan. I am still open to conviction, but I want to hear argument, not denunciation.
—A Mugwump.

By way of preface to the subject of discussion, and in the most amiable spirit, we question the justness of our correspondent's mild rebuke and gentle remonstrance. We are unconscious of ever having discussed Mr. Johnson or his pretensions otherwise than in language calm and dispassionate. We have never attacked him wantonly or in a spirit of malevolence. In illustrating the aspects of truth revealed by his conduct we may occasionally have been betrayed into too much vigor of phrase, too much violence of epithet, but it should be remembered that language and theme must always be more or less congruous in tone. Besides not to speak ill of that which is not good, one must be silent or dishonest. Words, after all, are but the pictures of our thoughts, and Mr. Johnson does not inspire pleasant thoughts in one who has seen the wheels go round in the complex machinery of his conduct, and who has observed vivid flashes of disparity between his professions and his performances. Of course one is not always justified in speaking one's mind. And certainly it is sound public policy to eschew personalities in political campaigns; for personalities breed those corrosive distempers that have disintegrated nations. Discussion of principles is preferable to discussion of men. But when candidates for office represent themselves to be the embodiment of certain principles, and it is known that they are something quite different, plainspeaking of an intimate personal character becomes a sacred public duty. This is why the present campaign ought not to be conducted along academic lines. Obtruding itself like a sore thumb the Johnson personality is a moral issue not to be blinked. It is important that we should scrutinize Mr. Johnson's noisy pretensions and acquaint ourselves with his past with a view to informing our judgment. As we ought to know whether we are to find in Mr. Johnson's precept and example the highest standard of political orthodoxy it behooves us to ask ourselves certain pertinent questions designed to discover that sublimest of things—the plain truth. And thus are we to lead ourselves into personalities. Fortunately we may console ourselves with the reflection that even should the inquiry tend to lower the gubernatorial candidate in our esteem it can do no harm to be reduced to a cheaper estimate of him as by that means we can get a more cheerful view of many of our fellow-men who are being ruthlessly decried and traduced wherever and whenever Mr. Johnson can get an audience. True Mr. Johnson has indicated lately that he has no stomach for the form of inquiry that we propose. This is usually the case with dealers in wholesale defamation. They are extremely sensitive to personal criticism. The habitual reviler, the man of evil tongue who delights in cutting a swath through the feelings of his compeers has a thin skin easy of penetration by the barbs of righteous wrath. But he who lives by abuse alone is not entitled to immunity therefrom. Moreover when your audibly virtuous man runs amuck blasting reputations with the thunderbolts of language he exposes himself to tests which all the world has the right to apply; which those who are able ought to apply for the purpose of disarming calumny.

Some Pertinent Questions

The tests to which we purpose subjecting the Hon. Hiram Johnson are not to be applied on the biblical principle of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. We will deal with him on a clean-cut, legitimate, controversial basis. We will not adopt Mr. Johnson's method which is so well illustrated by his assumption that his opponent should be held responsible for everything that is said by his (Johnson's) enemies. This, to say the least, is an unmanly method of controversy, and it is not likely to commend Mr. Johnson to people of refined sensibilities. It is what Cardinal Newman describes with some bitterness as "poisoning the wells of controversy." Our intention is to confine ourselves for the purpose of deduction to the facts as we know them. Now as we have suggested we should ask ourselves certain questions. Among them are these: Does Mr. Johnson instinctively revolt at what is impure in politics and in the practices of his profession? Has he risen above the frailties of his calling? Is he pregnant with reformative efficacy? Is insincerity abhorrent to him? If elected Governor would he be likely to give us a clean and honest administration? It is but reasonable that the people should require these questions to be answered; for Mr. Johnson affirms that he is animated by patriotic motives; that he is running for Governor not for his own benefit, but for the people's benefit; that he is sacrificing his personal interests to redeem the State from the foul clutch of iniquitous "special interests." He does not pretend to be skilled in the affairs of government. Economy is not his watch-word. He has but one reform to carry out, and that one is grounded in a moral principle. He asks the people to elect him not for his political principles but because he is purer of heart than his opponent and holier than many of the former leaders of his own party whom he denounces as unconvicted felons. So it is obvious that we must have a great deal to do with the personal equation in this campaign. Let us therefore not be squeamish. Despite our partiality to sweetness, let us not be afraid of the light. Who is this superheated apostle of political purity? What are his antecedents? When first we find him doing politics he is attending to the practical end of things for his father, the Hon. Grove L. Johnson of Sacramento. Johnson pere is running for Congress and Johnson the younger is managing the campaign. Johnson pere is defeated and from Sacramento comes the doleful wail that the Octopus is ungrateful as is evident from its failure to put sufficient money into the campaign of a faithful servant. Thus we glimpse the genesis of our stern reformer.

Turning the Searchlight On

Now let us view our gubernatorial candidate in the midst of the activities of his profession. His introduction to us in this city is in the role of a criminal lawyer, defending every Tom, Dick and Harry with the price, so little given to discrimination where clients are concerned that liberties are taken with his Christian name, and he is jocularly alluded to as "Hire-Him." Presently he is retained as one of the prosecutors in the graft cases, and the organs of the prosecution hail him as a great civic patriot. The laurels that he now wears were bestowed on him for the part that he played in our great civic drama. How strange are the accidents that shape the course of men's lives! How curious that the world should be more prone to recompense the appearance of merit than merit itself! Mr. Johnson became a graft prosecutor not because he was in sympathy with the graft prosecution but because he was hired by Mr. Rudolph Spreckels. This is no gratuitous assertion. We affirm on authority in which we have absolute confidence that before Mr. Johnson was retained by Mr. Spreckels he discussed the probability of his being employed by Abe Ruef and expressed the hope that he would be so retained. After being engaged by Mr. Spreckels he was pictured to a credulous populace as a volunteer inspired by nothing but zeal for the civic welfare, animated by nothing but hatred of wrongdoing. And in that guise so far as it could be contrived for him he rendered service not only in court but in the hustings. Now for the purpose of this inquiry it is of the greatest importance that we should have a thorough understanding of the nature and circumstances of Mr. Johnson's employment as well as of his relations with the public. For when we understand these things we shall be able to appreciate the susceptibilities of the man who is now appealing to our confidence. The first thing to be understood is that Mr. Johnson was not what he is represented to be. The discovery of his character having been made we are now told by his apologists that it was not discreditable for him to accept a fee as a special prosecutor. This is a characteristic bit of insingenuousness designed to darken the issue. Nobody has censured Mr. Johnson for accepting a fee. He has been censured for pretending that he was acting out of the fulness of his civic patriotism when the fee was in his pocket. This deception which admits of no palliation Mr. Johnson now aggravates by trying to create the impression that there was nothing equivocal in his conduct; that what he did was in perfect accord with the ethics of his profession, whereas, the truth is, as we hope to show, he practiced a deception for a mean, sinister and sordid purpose. And that he and his accomplices were fully aware of the shameful nature of their conduct we hold to be evident from their persistent and protracted screening of the truth. The truth was exported from them on the witness stand, but not until after two years of dissimulation. For more than two years they obscured the light. The glare came round by side matches; oblique rays, stray gleams from the truth penetrated through neglected cracks. Why, it may be asked, were we so studiously barred from the light? The answer is obvious. Because Mr. Johnson knows that when a lawyer accepts a fee to prosecute men charged with crime it is highly improper to permit himself to be regarded as a public spirited citizen and thus give false weight to his exhortations to the jury. But Mr. Johnson did more than connive at the deception of juries; he deceived the public. He went upon the bema in the role of civic patriot in two municipal campaigns to give the people the benefit of his advice. Presumably his only interest was that of a public spirited citizen. The truth is he was the kept attorney of a cabal talking for his own interest. This interest was symbolized by the sack which he hoped to keep available through the agency of the men whose election he was advocating. As we view the figure of Mr. Johnson in the perspective of history how far from prepossessing are the outlines! Not unusual is it for lawyers to hire out their words and anger and allow their clients a volume of vehemence in proportion to the fee, but ordinarily in so doing they practice no deception; judge and jury are under no delusion. During the graft prosecution, however, though the judges apprehended the situation, the juries and the dear people did not. Men there were who divined the truth, but they dared not make the accusation they could not support. It was considered a very serious matter to charge a member of the bar with the indecency of which we now know Mr. Johnson was guilty, and which Mr. Johnson and his apologists with affected unconcern would whistle down the wind.

The Dalzell Brown Case

We now come to another count in the indictment. And here let it be understood that we are confining ourselves only to matters of record. With tittle-tattle of which there is an abundance, with matters of which we are only morally certain, we are not to be concerned. To the record, then, we go and take up for consideration and reflection the case of Dalzell Brown. This is a case about which there has been much talk of a character that has served rather to cloud than to illuminate the point that should be kept in view. In this matter as in the matter of Mr. Johnson's relations with the graft prosecution, his defenders have shrewdly conducted the argument into a channel that leads away from the issue. True, they say, Mr. Johnson defended the bank looter, but what of that? How absurd, they add, to abuse an attorney for accepting employment from a man charged with crime! How absurd, indeed! Nay, how far more to the credit of an attorney that he has rendered service to the unfortunate than that he has hired out his rage and talents to one man to gratify the passion of revenge by sending another to jail! But Mr. Johnson's connection with the bank scandal was somewhat peculiar. If Dalzell Brown had gone into the open market to employ Johnson for no other purpose than to have the benefit of the only thing that he could legitimately sell—his legal ability—there would be nothing for us to criticize. The truth is, however, that Brown purchased something which, at the time, was more valuable than legal ability. He purchased that imponderable commodity that Abe Ruef huckstered through the years of his villainy, the thing that is idiomatically known as "pull." The pull was Johnson's. Through the graft prosecution, which was then in the halcyon period, a very strong bond of sympathy and intimacy had been established between the man who is now a candidate for Governor and Mr. William Langdon, who is now one of his most ardent supporters, and who expects to become a member of his official family. Mr. Johnson was an appendage of District Attorney Langdon's office. As such it was natural for one to suppose that if available for defensive purposes in a criminal case Mr. Johnson by reason of the facilities that he enjoyed would be able to render services beyond the commonplace. Yet technically he would be guilty of no violation of professional ethics in becoming the defender of a man charged with crime. For as a prosecutor he was in no official capacity. Indeed at that time he was believed to be a prosecutor not for revenue but for the gratification of his patriotic impulses. Only to men of more than average sagacity were all the sinuosities of affairs perceptible. Of such was the man who looted the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company. And he lost no time in engaging the services of the man with the pull. Johnson became his attorney. Nothing flagrantly immoral about that. But at least open to criticism was the course pursued by Dalzell Brown's attorney. He did not go into open court, and give his client the benefit of his legal ability. Apparently not for that was he hired; not for that did he share with his client in his ill-gotten gains. Rather was it for the purpose of putting through a deal which could not be put through without the consent of the good and pure Mr. Langdon. In the privacy of the District Attorney's office the deal was consummated. Dalzell Brown was permitted to plead guilty to one indictment and take but eighteen months in the penitentiary with the assurance that he would be so frequently needed by the District Attorney that the period of actual incarceration would be greatly reduced. And the records of the penitentiary now show that he was not more than nine months behind prison bars. Here we close the tale with a suggestion which we believe to be warranted by what has gone before. It is commonly reported that the fee paid by Dalzell Brown to Hiram Johnson consisted of stock in the Western Pacific Railroad Company. Hiram Johnson is today inveighing against the Octopus and promising to do it as much damage as possible, and among his most enthusiastic supporters are officials of the Western Pacific Company. Our suggestion is that it would be instructive to learn whether the standard-bearer of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League is still in possession of the tainted securities that he received from the prehensile hand of the man who enjoyed the advantage of his pull.

Perspective Impressions

It is really reported that the Hon. Frank Dunne is about to be married.

Colonel Roosevelt has characterized a Federal judge who ruled against him in a case in which he had a deep personal interest as a jackass and a crook. More and more does the Colonel articulate like his friends Hiram and Francis J.

Carlyle once said that to judge of a contemporary man "you must in general reverse the world's judgment about him; the world is not only wrong on that matter, but cannot on any such matter be right." But sometimes the man lives long enough to enable the world to reverse its judgment and get right. This appears to be what is happening in the case of Maria's dear friend Theodore.

Whenever your candidate is a favorite in the betting point to the fact with great glee as though it were understood that the gamblers possessed the clairvoyant power of registering the emotions of the people. When he is not a favorite remind your friends that John D. Siebe was a three to one favorite on the eve of the election at which he was beaten two to one by Assessor Dodge.

Raymond Duncan Comes Home

Clothed in Culturine but Scantily Clad Otherwise Our Old Townsman Returns in the Guise of a Prophet, Proclaiming What We Must Do to be Saved, and Receives the Treatment Usually Accorded to Prophets in Their Own Country.

By Edward F. O'Day

When Thackeray went to Athens he was minded to say that he had much the same memory of Greek as of castor oil. That is easy to believe, because many youngsters who tolerate or even relish the study of Latin cannot abide the elder tongue. There are others who like Greek and when I was at college I numbered myself among them. During the four years or so that I was purging my emotions and refining my taste with the Hellenic masters I extracted not only profit but pleasure from the difficult task. The profit remains but the pleasure is overcast now by the consciousness that my Greek has gone the unlamented way of my chemistry and my calculus into the region of dim, half-remembered things. Just the same all that is associated with ancient Greece retains its power to charm me.

So Raymond Duncan excited in me a lively interest. I looked forward to his coming with great curiosity. Ever since he arrived in this country with his Greek wife, his Greco-American child and his band of Greek mummers I have followed his progress from city to city and endeavored to arrive at some estimate of his worth. The newspapers did not render me much assistance. Being written for hoi polloi and not for hoi aristoi, with an eye to the drachmai of commerce rather than the kudos of culture—as Duncan might say—they have paid a great deal of attention to his bare shins and very little to his brains; his chiton and chlamys have received more notice than his message; his flowing locks have suggested hair oil rather than classicality. Forced to wait until Duncan made his appearance in his old town before passing judgment upon him, I find that the time spent in anticipating his coming might better have been devoted to whistling ragtime or any other improving diversion.

For Duncan was not worth waiting for. He is Greek in clothes only. He draws the crowd solely by the singularity of his attire, like a medicine man at a street corner, but unlike the medicine man he cannot hold the crowd once he has gathered it. He has not put on wisdom with his chiton or doffed vulgarity with his trousers. He has let his dank locks grow down his back but he has missed the spirit of Greek amenity; he has strapped his feet into sandals but he strays as far from truth and breeding as a hob-nailed clodhopper.

I do not know how long Duncan lived in Athens but I will hazard a guess that his knowledge of Greek is confined to a speaking acquaintance with the bastard language which is used by the degenerate descendants of Plato and Demosthenes. I'll bet Duncan wouldn't know a digamma if he saw one; that he couldn't construe an ode of Pindar; that he wouldn't be able offhand to explain the difference between the "Electra" of Sophocles and the "Electra" of Euripides; and that he has never read Aristotle's Poetics. These are by no means the arcana of Greek culture; they are elementary and I cite them because I don't think Duncan has mastered the elements of Greek culture. I do this with greater confidence because I am convinced that Duncan is a stranger to English culture. Duncan's acquisition is culturine and a mighty thin veneer at that. He has come home to show us that he is not even a clever charlatan.

These are not the words of welcome I would extend to a sincere propagandist. As Addison said, a man may be damned for believing too little but never for believing too much and the honest fanatic is entitled to a certain consideration. But Duncan is too long on pretense and too short on performance to be worthy the benefit of the doubt. Besides, with one breath he promises to uplift us and with the next he insults our intelligence, which is irritating for a moment or so and thereafter disgusting. Unfortunately there are fools in San Francisco as elsewhere, and fools are frequently the best-meaning people on earth. As the ass brays unto the ass, so does Duncan speak to the fools and the fools indulge him to the top of his bent by clapping and hollering for more. If one fool can be separated from his folly through being told something about Duncan, then Duncan is worth writing about; but I have my doubts on the subject. "Honey is not for the mouth of asses," said wise old Sancho Panza; so let us save the honey for you and me and rail at Duncan for our own satisfaction.

Before Duncan arrived I received a neat folder telling me what I might expect. Duncan was therein described as the "apostle of art and culture," his wife Penelope as "the sweetest singer since Sappho and the most marvelous dramatic artist of modern times" and the other members of the troupe in similar modest terms. Now this is the language of the circus poster—no self-respecting press agent would think of using it—and it struck me as particularly incongruous when applied to the sacrosanct cause of classic uplift until I happened to read further that the "Electra" of Sophocles was to be given "with the original cast." Then it struck me that the press agent must be hazy about the meaning of some English words and I decided to disregard the folder and seek light elsewhere.

The newspaper interviews were illuminating, but their illumination was shed obliquely on the character of Duncan and not at all on his achievements. I found him talking about the "Pythagorean system of gymnastics" and declaring that "your music teachers have no conception of the real law of music as Pythagoras discovered it in nature and among the common people." As Duncan confounded Pythagoras, one of the greatest of the Greek philosophers, with Pythagoras, the boxer and trainer of wrestlers, it was easy to perceive that he was simply throwing words as a youngster throws rocks, to keep his hand in. But it puzzles me to conceive what Duncan can possibly think he knows about the Pythagorean discoveries in music. Every musician knows that Pythagoras added an eighth string to the lyre and that with the aid of the monochord he systematized the scales; but what more does Duncan know? Has he read into the single sentence which Diogenes Laertius in his life of Pythagoras devotes to this subject a meaning of which the rest of the world is ignorant? Has Duncan ever read Diogenes Laertius? I'll bet he hasn't. Has he ever heard of him. I hae ma doots. But perhaps he has read Plutarch's disquisition on music—and then again perhaps he hasn't.

Again, Duncan declared to one of his interviewers (and repeated the statement on the stage), that Shakespeare was great because "he had the Greek idea and harked back to Greek forms of beauty." Here too is something startlingly new about Shakespeare. Did Shakespeare read the tragedies of Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides? Ben Jonson is our witness that his friend had "small Latin and less Greek" which does not seem to imply that he could read a Greek play in the original, for I suppose it will not be gainsaid by Duncan that with the possible exception of Pindar the Greek dramatist present the greatest difficulty to the student. Many a schoolboy who can construe Homer glibly flounders when he tackles Sophocles. Were there any English translation of the Greek plays for Shakespeare to read? The earliest translation of which I know was Wase's version of the "Electra" of Sophocles which was published in 1649, thirty-three years after Shakespeare's death. Duncan may know something of this subject of which I am ignorant, but the authorities are against him. Sir Walter Scott to cite the one most convenient to my hand in his Essay on the Drama has this to say: "With an education more extensive, and a taste refined by the classical models, it is probable that he also (Shakespeare), in admiration of the ancient drama, might have mistaken the form for the essence, and subscribed to those rules which have produced such masterpieces of art. Fortunately for the full exertion of a genius as comprehensive and versatile as intense and powerful, Shakespeare had no access to any models of which the commanding merit might have controlled and limited his own exertions." So it looks as though Shakespeare who was an incomparably greater dramatist than Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides put together, was not indebted to them for any part of his inspiration. But as a matter of cold fact nobody who understands the classic genius would think of saying that Shakespeare "harked back to Greek forms of beauty."

My opportunity to study Duncan at first hand came on Sunday night when he presented the "Electra" of Sophocles at the Savoy Theater. It was an interesting occasion. Hundreds of members of our Greek colony deserted their candy stores and billiard halls or mopped the sweat of street work from their brows to rub elbows with deluded culture and exultant culturine at the box office where they paid, not the two oboli which Pericles fixed as the prices of admission in order that the meanest citizen might attend the theater but three drachmas, that is to say, seventy-five cents in the good coin of the realm. Culture and culturine were assessed from one dollar to two and a half to be let in on the ground floor of the Greek revival. Duncan says he doesn't have to pay his mummers, so his propaganda must net him a pretty penny.

It speedily developed that "knocking" was an important feature of the Greek uplift as preached by Duncan. He is not a handsome man by any means and when he spoke one wished that his face might be transfigured by that glow of beautiful thought which made men forget the ugliness of Socrates when he discoursed. Before the play commenced Duncan made a tedious speech in which he characterized the American stage as unspeakably vile and immoral, took a fling at Miss Viola Allen and Professor William Dallen

Raymond Duncan, Hellenist

By Harry Cowell

First, a frank word of the man Raymond Duncan, as I see him, then, one of his work, as I see it.

A friend of Greece, sincere to fanaticism, Mr. Duncan is in no little danger of doing her more hurt than any "other foe" she owns, if he continues to indulge at his present rate his voracious Celtic appetite for extravaganzas. He is essentially a man with a mission, an enthusiast, going his sandaled way preoccupied, listening, like Leonardo da Vinci "to a voice, silent for other men." The enthusiast inevitably loses the sense of proportion, else he fails of his mission. Mr. Duncan does not seem destined to fail of his.

And yet, and yet, though miracles of loveliness will doubtless issue from the ever-fertile womb of the great mother, the rebirth of dead beauty, be it Celtic, Hebraic, or Hellenic, is scarcely to be expected.

Philhellene myself to the tips of the fingers that pound with anything but rhythmic grace this modern typewriter of mine, I had thought it impossible to overstate the claims of Greece as the mother of what is most worth while in modern culture, but Mr. Duncan does the impossible with disconcerting ease. Hear him: there is no greatness, no living water other than that which stems from ancient Greece. Whatever of knowledge, virtue or beauty we own is Grecian all. Alas! it is only too temptingly easy to carry off its feet with "all," an audience that a Demosthenes could not move with "much." The critic, it may be, might well give his sorry sanity to be an enthusiast glad and mad. Exactitude calls forth no rapturous applause, nor is crowned with wild olive. Overstatement is the sine qua non of successful oratory. The idea driving him, forcing him into the arena to fight for it (as says Heine), the man with a mission must needs overstate his cause. This Mr. Duncan does with a vengeance upon all that is modern, clothed modernwise and in its right mind. The theater of nowadays is stupid, and stupidity in drama is not only one of seven cardinal sins but the sin unpardonable. The sin unpardonable. I know not one critic minded to gainsay that. But Ibsen is of today, and not stupid. To overlook Ibsen is—well, not wise.

Mr. Duncan holds that whatever of good we moderns own came out of Athens, but his not unkindly critic, that there came out of Nazareth for us and for him good immeasurable. There is a glory that was Judea as well as a glory that was Greece—is Greece, let our hellenist tell the tale thereof.

In comparing, contrasting, ancient Greece with modern America, it is well to bear in mind that the things of classic Greece left to us are for the most part the forever joys that pass not into nothingness, things of beauty seen through magic casements opening on the foam of perilous seas in fairy lands forlorn—beauty natural and wonderful that appeals to the imperishable pagan in us all.

With the ardor of a god's advocate, Mr. Duncan pleads with us little people to grow great with the greatness that was Greece—this in the vernacular, then in their native tongue makes his appeal to the Greek gods (in the gallery) who, expatriate, respond thunderously, as becomes true sons of Zeus. With the propagandist's fine impertinence he stays us with uplifted hand and voice, nor will allow us to go unchecked our money-making ways heedless and hence untried by the infinite spaces of heaven.

Mr. Duncan takes himself with such high seriousness, speaking ex-cathedra as the very pope of sweetness and light, that we wee critics must needs take him with an ample grain of the salt of common sense and smile not altogether unsympathetically in our unlovely modern sleeves. High-priestwise, Mr. Duncan preaches a gospel of joyous work, of Greek gladness gained in the doing well of whatever the hand finds to do, be it the sowing one by one of beans or broadcast the seed of archaic Greek culture; the gospel of making things with one's own hands, "making them all fair to look upon, filling the common ways of life with the reflection of some far-off brightness," as the philhellenic Pater puts it. Joyously with his own hands Mr. Duncan weaves his graceful garments and rhythmically washes them, and in them is good to look upon, making the moderns nearby him hideous by comparison. Let the biased eye beware of seeing only beauty in these ancient Greek costumes, and not also use. Dressed in just such hand-made, home-dyed stuffs, the ancient Greeks were much given to doing things and doing them inimitably well. Did we all wear the like beautiful clothes, Monday indubitably would be less blue.

Propagandistlike, Mr. Duncan blazes his trail through that undergrowth, our dense ignorance, with a preposterous tongue. His joy in discovering Greece for himself is extremely young. Generous child that he is, he must needs share it with you and me. For one, I am grateful. He has my heartfelt thanks—this despite the fact that I too discovered Greece for myself, and am in a better position to know how young it makes and keeps one than is our youthful hellenist's self.

Mr. Duncan sees in church, school, and theatre a trinity of educational forces working for the common good, in a word, for culture. 'Tis a fair vision for any one possessed of the not ignoble belief that he who is well instructed is divinely entertained. The gospel of glad work is good, worthy the wisest ear. In this world is for man a moment awfully brief, which it becomes him to spend nobly, with dignity, and then his portion is popped sleep, and, it may be, awakening to cull knowledge of the next world in the meadows of asphodel. Not unmindful of this live great persons, great peoples. The Greeks were a noble people, and were glad nobly and nobly grieved. To sympathize profoundly with Elektra's grief and with Elektra's joy is perforce ennobling. And I doubt if there was one of us present at Mr. Duncan's revival of Sophocles his great drama so small, so priggishly critical as not to be profoundly moved by Penelope Duncan's passionate portrayal of sisterly devotion. Much of the loveliness Raymond Duncan brought back with him from Greece is anything but ancient. Well as Saint Beuve knew I know that the question of deepest moment is not whether we were moved by Elektra or not, but whether or not we ought to have been moved. Let the answer here be what it may, I was moved, and naturally deem bowelless and not all that he ought to be the critic that came, saw, and was unconquered. Greater, or at least, more interesting drama than the Elektra of the Raymond Duncan company is far to seek. Than the one here playing at the much apologized-for Savoy, not this side Hades, I take it, is to be found a cast more vitally imbued with the spirit of ancient Greece. Technical imperfections I am not scholar enough to point out, but the heart of me is pagan enough to know its own. To be sure, not a little of what was said was Greek to me. Listening to Dionysos Devaris his reading of the noble lines, to Penelope Duncan's, to the reading of her tragic-voiced sister, I bitterly regretted that I had not sat at the feet of John Mahaffy to better purpose. Beauty, however, is always understandable, even in a Barnum age, wherein

"The bones of Agamemnon are a show, and ruined is his royal monument."

A Suggestion for the Purity Congress

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I read with great interest what you said last week about the meeting of the American Purity Congress. But I do not agree with you. To my mind the noble men and women who are heroically trying to get rid of corruption in large cities are entitled to the highest praise. Being thoroughly in sympathy with their aims I do not hesitate to offer these splendid missionaries a suggestion as to the extension of their field of activity. I would advise them to turn their attention to the newspapers. The newspapers are prolific agents of corruption. I refer to their advertising columns. They are constantly publishing vile advertisements which cannot have any but a deplorable effect upon the unfortunate wretches who are caught by them. Let me cite two instances. The Examiner published the advertisement of Dr. Grant, the abortionist who is charged with the murder of Miss Eva Swan. There is a law on our statute books making it a felony to publish advertising of that sort but the fear of punishment did not deter the Examiner from taking the dirty money of Dr. Grant. And the Examiner was full of virtuous indignation when this miserable Dr. Grant was caught in a foul crime. Should not the Purity Congress turn its attention to this case? Now for another case. Last Sunday, while the Purity Congress was in session, the readers of the Sunday Call, men, women and children, were given an opportunity to read the advertisement of one of those dangerous quacks who pretend to cure "diseases that wreck men." This advertisement promised a positive cure in ninety days for an ailment which reputable physicians do not pretend to cure within any stated time. In the Examiner this same advertisement appeared accompanied by the offer of a legal guarantee "to cure you or refund your money." I need not explain to you the viciousness of such advertisements. I know of cases where ignorant men have fallen into the clutches of these quacks with the result that they have become hopeless physical wrecks. You may recall instances where advertisements of this kind have led to murder or suicide. I do, and the editors probably remember them more vividly than either of us. There is not an editor or newspaper manager or advertising solicitor in San Francisco who does not know that these advertisements are arrant frauds. Yet they publish them. Again I say, should not the Purity Congress take up this matter? It would be a splendid opportunity for the Congress to test the sincerity of the newspapers in their warfare on corruption. I know this is an unpleasant subject to call your attention to, but I feel very strongly about it and hope that you will publish this letter. Please sign it,

Our Beautiful Newspapers

Editor Town Talk: I see that your senile contemporary, the Call, argues that there must be something wrong with Theodore Bell since he is receiving the support of Mr. Hearst's Examiner. How sweet are the amenities of journalism in this dear old parish that is now making lofty pretensions of metropolitan dignity and claiming to be big enough in more than one sense to entertain the whole world at a World's Fair! Newspaper controversy in San Francisco is for all the world like a tongue-scrap between fisherwomen or mortal combat between skunks. In each newspaper office the idea prevails that argument is always to be demolished by impugning the motives of your adversary or by calling him names. As a result of this barbarous method of warfare every daily newspaper in San Francisco bears a bad reputation. Every newspaper has been held up to obloquy by each of its rivals. Consequently the man in the streets regards them all as birds of a feather, and justly so, for as a matter of fact many of their frailties and defects are shared in common. Each has been convicted of crimes against honesty and decency. Each is edited by a man, who, judged not only by his self-revelations but by what is said of him by his contemporaries in his own profession, is a pretty bad egg. So what's the use! What a waste of time to read what they have to say! How obvious is their insincerity; how shallow their violent assertions! Ponder for a moment the Call's argument against Bell and see what it leads to. According to the Call, Bell is supported by the Examiner; the Examiner is owned by that vile creature William R. Hearst; therefore Bell is a vile creature. By the same token we are led to the same conclusion with reference to Johnson. If anything the syllogism is a little stronger. The Chronicle came out for Johnson last Monday. The Chronicle's coming was belated. The Chronicle, according to the Call and also according to the Bulletin, barter its editorial columns. Furthermore, according to both the Call and the Bulletin, Mr. De Young is worse than Hearst. Again the Bulletin is wild-eyed for Johnson. Notoriously the Bulletin is the most corrupt and shameless sheet in the United States. Guess the answer again. Says the Call and Bulletin, the Post is for Bell; Pat Calhoun owns the Post; therefore Bell is Pat Calhoun's puppet. But we have also learned on the same unimpeachable authority that the Chronicle is on Calhoun's pay roll. Then why shouldn't we argue that Pat is for Johnson? We shouldn't because that wouldn't suit our purpose. What do these slop-bucket editors take us for anyway? Of course we know Pat Calhoun is for Bell. We know that because we know that it would be most unnatural for him to be for one of the graft prosecutors. But hist! Who is Tirey L. Ford for? Unnatural, you will say, for him to be for Johnson? But look it up, Mr. Editor. I am told that he is for Johnson and that he is counted among Johnson's earnest supporters. If that be so, and the argument of the Call and the Bulletin as to the connection between Calhoun and Bell is sound, then why cannot we make the same argument as to Johnson and Ford? Of course I am merely overwhelming you with a farrago of suggestions. Perhaps I'm going crazy. Well, occasionally I read the Call.

Poe in the Hall of Fame

Editor Town Talk: After many years Edgar Allen Poe has received enough votes to gain admittance to the Hall of Fame. Now let us have a Hall of Ill Fame for the addle-pated crew that kept him out for many years. Some time ago I read what you said briefly about Poe, his influence on the world's literature and the preference that some of our so-called critics have for mediocrities all unconscious of the greatness of the greatest genius in the literary art of this country. It's about time for our critics, or rather our pretenders in the field of criticism, to wake up and realize the world's indebtedness to the man to whom homage is paid by scholars in France, England and Germany. Poe has been a stimulus to a whole generation of romance-mongers. He is the greatest of all masters of the grotesque, the horrible and the ingenious, and there need be no defense of his title to undying fame. As a critic he created an era, gave rise to a new cult of taste and beauty. As an English critic has said of him, "Whether in theory or in practice he was ahead not only of his own time, but of all time." Beauty was his cult; poetry for him was the rhythmic creation of beauty. As a critic he vindicated the principles of judgment by his great praise of Alfred Tennyson as early as 1843, long before the laureate-to-be had emerged from obscurity. Poe was also a great poet, and as such a guiding flame in the pathway of the present-day mystics. A master of the short story he also revived the novel of adventure and lost treasure, of South Seas and Captain Kid. He has been imitated by Huysmans and Anatole France who have emulated his crudition, by Gaboriau and Conan Doyle who have cheapened his mystery. Great have been the atrocities committed by disciples of Poe's M. Dupin. Singularly enough Poe was made known to the English-speaking world through the French. It was not till Frenchmen discovered his art and enthused over it that Englishmen and Americans began to take him seriously. Baudelaire was the first to enthuse over him. Baudelaire translated and imitated him, and he is indebted to Poe for all the bizarre and satanic elements in his work. And Baudelaire has given to France her most characteristic literature. Moreover what he got from Poe he gave to Swinburne. Neither "The Flowers of Evil" nor the "Poems and Ballads" would ever have been written had it not been for Poe. To Poe we are indebted for that intellectual movement in which Pater and Wilde figured conspicuously. And this was the man of far-reaching influence who died like Marlowe and many another genius, unheeded, almost unrecognized. It strikes me as rather fortunate for the Hall of Fame, or at least for the dead who have been admitted there, that the immortal prestige of Poe has been added to the institution.

Siftings from Many Sources

Cataclysmic Policy

Mr. Clifford J. Owen has disposed of his controlling interest in the stock of the San Jose Times to G. E. and Percival R. Milnes, two well-known newspapermen of the Garden City and they have just explained how they intend to run their paper. Here is one of their promises: "Independence will characterize the editorial and news columns of this paper. Our chief desire is to publish a newspaper, using the word newspaper in its most comprehensive sense—that is, to publish the news, publish all the news and publish it all the time, regardless of whom it may affect."

This is followed by the statement that they do not promise anything revolutionary. Tut! Tut! The California newspaper which would publish all the news all the time regardless of whom it might affect would be not only revolutionary but cataclysmic.

The Fight Against Cancer

M. Doumergue, French Minister of Public Instruction, presided at the opening sitting of the international Conference on the subject of cancer, which took place recently at the Paris Faculty of medicine with upwards of twenty countries represented. Of particular interest are some remarks which were made by the secretary general, Professor Delbet, who denied that cancer is incurable. An operation, undertaken in time, and well performed, he said, can bring about a cure. But the credulity of the public and its instinctive faith in quacks lead to the delay of operations, so that they are responsible for thousands of victims. This is a social danger against which the public should be put on its guard. German statistics laid before the conference make out that the mortality from cancer per 10,000 inhabitants is as low as 2.4 in Spain, while 7.45 is the figure in Germany, a small fraction over 9 in England, and 10 in France, Switzerland and Denmark showing the highest averages with 12.5 and 12.2 respectively. But the French experts seriously question the accuracy of these statistics, arguing that they are probably from 5 to 10 per cent wide of the mark. It is extremely noteworthy that Professor Delbet gave it as his deliberate opinion that cancer is, after tuberculosis, the greatest scourge of the human race.

High Prices in Austria

The high cost of living has reached Austria—and has duly enraged the testy inhabitants. According to various estimates, the anti-agrarian demonstration that took place recently on the Ringstrasse of Vienna was composed of at least 200,000 persons. Whether it will materially hasten the opening of the Austro-Hungarian frontiers to foreign and especially Argentine meat remains to be seen. Agrarian opposition is by no means overpowered in Austria, while in Hungary it is still triumphant. Dr. Neumayer, the burgomaster of Vienna, who has so far departed from the traditions of his predecessors as to pay a friendly visit to the burgomaster of Budapest, announced on his return that he had failed to obtain the assent of the Budapest municipality to the importation of Argentine meat. It is nevertheless apparent that a serious movement is growing up in Austria against the intolerable costliness of the prime necessities of life, and that something more than the admission of transoceanic meat will presently be needed to ease the economic tension resulting from the combined effects of increased taxation and the rise in rents and in the prices of clothing and foodstuffs.

Lights a Crime Preventive

The value of light, and particularly electric light, as a preventive of crime is emphasized in the official history of the St. Louis Police Department, recently published. The history states:

"In the early history of St. Louis the pioneer Police Captains found that nine-tenths of the crime in the city was committed at night. To combat this they trebled the night force. They knew that light was a preventive of crime, but the only lights obtainable were the lanterns of the guards. These in time gave way to torches, and the torches to gas. Gas was supplanted by electricity, and the best police officials declare that the electric light is the ablest foe of the criminal. Darkness makes crime. Electric lights, properly distributed, prevent crime, but not only that, they attract crowds, bring business to the streets and the districts thus lighted and give the shoppers a feeling of security obtainable in no other manner. Electric lights in the home are the best protection against burglars. One whisk of the switch and a flood of light is there to disconcert the boldest housebreaker in the land. Porch lights help to illuminate the yard and street, and prevent porch climbing on the part of burglars."

Fresno Is Ahead of Us

When is San Francisco to have a symphony orchestra? The question has been reiterated for years, but nothing is done. Meanwhile I learn from the Fresno Herald that the metropolis of the raisin belt has acquired this indispensable adjunct of music culture. Professor Purt Bella, who was formerly of the Royal Grand Opera House of Budapest, is concert master and Professor Gustav Schultheis, formerly conductor of the Philharmonic Society of Hamburg, is director. These are imposing names. At the head of the local talent stands Professor J. Wesley Tilton and already thirty musicians have been enrolled. The Herald mentions casually that San Jose has a symphony orchestra of which it is exceptionally proud. That is not surprising. Again I ask, when will the Paris of America follow the lead of the raisin and prune cities?

A Swat at the Associated Press

The Fresno Herald, by the way, has just put the Associated Press on the pan and roasted it to a turn. All because the game between Philadelphia and Chicago was given precedence over the news of the death of Julia Ward Howe. Incidentally the Herald pans the American public:

"It was more to them to know what Mr. Over-all and Mr. Chance were doing than to read of the passing away of that noble woman, Julia Ward Howe, whose name will never be forgotten by those who honor brave and true hearts. It is not to our honor that the Associated Press paid such scant courtesy to the memory of that great woman, but the Associated Press is in for business and to give the people what is wanted by them."

Julia Ward Howe was a splendid American, of course, but the American National Game is a bigger thing than the American National Battle Hymn. The Battle Hymn of the Republic is addressed to the God of Battle; its spirit is the spirit of the Old Testament and its reference to the Savior embodies a glaring misstatement.

He Says Heney Lied

Frank Heney is very busy campaigning the second district with William Kent. The canvass is going merrily, for I learn from the Oroville Mercury that I. G. Zumwalt, Kent's democratic opponent, has called Heney a liar. Heney declared that Zumwalt was running without a platform and Zumwalt after hurling the retort discourteous produced an imposing document beginning with Asiatic exclusion and ending with conservation of natural resources and declared, "Them's my sentiments," or words to the same effect. Why does Zumwalt insist on a platform? If he ran without one he would command the respect of the legions who are tired of political platforms. "Molasses to catch flies" still holds good.

Oh, You George!

The Oroville Mercury is a facetious paper. George Foster Jones, the son of ex-senator Jones of Oroville, has two important affairs on hand. He is running for district attorney of Butte county on the republican ticket and he is engaged to marry Miss Madie Gesford, the daughter of Judge Gesford of Napa. And this is the way the Mercury teases him:

"Hist, there is a mystery deep besides which the Los Angeles dynamiters case shimmers down to nothing. George Foster Jones is supposed to be doing overtime searching out the innocent voter and inoculating him with the Jones' Bug, but when George returned to town this morning from a three days' absence at Napa and San Francisco, he admitted that he went to see the 'Three Twins' and George did not go alone either."

dore Bell. A few days ago the Bulletin had this to say:

"We notice that Willie Hearst is again out for office. This time he is out for lieutenant-governor of New York on his Independent League party. Willie is always ready to run for office, especially if he can be of assistance to the Republican party."

This needs elucidation. Does the Santa Ana paper mean that Hearst wants to help the Republican party in New York only, or in California as well? The Hearst papers in this state are supporting Bell, but perhaps the Bulletin sees a deep laid plot on the part of Hearst to elect Johnson by boosting his opponent. That charge has been made against Hearst in previous California campaigns.

A Santa Cruz Exhorter

When the Santa Cruz editorial pen swings across the page in support of the interests of Fred Swanton's town the English language is sure to be enriched. Listen to the Sentinel man whooping it up:

"The bead of beer, the odor of flowers and the bouquet of champagne are great, intoxicating, for a moment hard to resist, but they are not lasting. People can't live on them. After an hour of hilarity, after a brief season among the flowers, mortal man must get down to the necessities of life. The necessities of life with us today are macadamized streets and roads, an abundance of pure water, handsome and substantial bridges and viaducts, an ample lighting system, rest-stations for man, hitching grounds for animals, and a sewer system that meets every demand of the best known sanitation laws."

By Empedocles, the inventor of rhetoric, this is great stuff! By all means let us have a sewer system rather than the odor of flowers. But the editor should look up the meaning of "necessities."

Our Giddy Portolans

Let no misguided individual imagine for one moment that the love of careless gayety has died out among the big men of San Francisco. Although a casual study of the situation may seem to show that all our leading cits are just now engaged in the interesting operation of reforming or being reformed, it would be absolutely inaccurate to conclude that the spice of gingery revelry is no longer hot i' the mouth or that the cakes and ale have been virtuously banished to make room for sackcloth and ashes. Take, for instance, the committee of distinguished gentlemen who made the Portola celebration of last year such a huge success that they astonished even themselves. The spirit of exuberant mirth which held sway during those delicious days when Queen Vergilia and Don Gaspar de Portola reigned over a laughing town is still potent for them. They held a banquet last week to commemorate the anniversary of the Portola and it was an extremely giddy affair. Of course it was reported in the newspapers but the discreet scribes were careful to lend the appearance of high-toned formality to one of the most informal dinners ever given in this city. When, oh when, at a local banquet board has the wine flowed so freely? And when did men surrender themselves with such complete satisfaction to wine's exhilarating influence? It was a frolic, a romp, a caper, a gambol, a lark or what you will. So carefree a gathering will not be seen for many a long day. Only once did a vein of seriousness obtrude in the precious lode of joviality and that was when the general manager of one of our newspapers suggested to the proprietor of another newspaper that he subscribe $100,000 to a new Portola fund. The newspaper proprietor lost his breath for nearly a minute

They Heard the Chimes

The merry doings of this festive occasion did not come to a conclusion when the merrymakers flung down their napkins and arose from the table. Far from it. A choice number of the gayest blades of all—men, believe me, whose names are synonymous with distinction in our community—decided to prolong the revel into the wee sma' hours. So they climbed into their motor cars and were whirled off to the Tenderloin. On the western edge of that garish district they entered a cafe and signalized their arrival by a furious bombardment of popping corks. As everybody knows, the music has been suppressed in the cafes of the Tenderloin but when one of the party of giddy Portolans ordered music and song the order was filled. For the first time in many nights the piano was opened and a couple of shouters executed the very latest ragtime innovations. The fun was fast and furious about one o'clock when a policeman passed and heard the lawless strains. Our indignant guardian of the law rushed into the cafe, sought out the proprietor and forcibly reminded him that the peace was being broken. "Well, arrest them," suggested the proprietor, indicating the prominent cits with a careless wave of the hand. The policeman took one look at the party and silently faded away. And what became of our roysterers? They climbed once more into their machines and were driven to the Chickens' Ball. "Ha! 'Twas a merry night."

He Interpreted McCarthy

So catholic was the spirit of amiability on that memorable night that one of the speakers hardly astonished his fellow revelers when he launched into an impassioned defense of Mayor McCarthy and his mayoral administration. Notwithstanding that this speaker is usually listed among those who look with disfavor upon a union labor regime his apologia created only the mildest surprise, so friendly did the banqueters feel toward everybody and everything. The orator lamented the distressing misconception of Mayor McCarthy's "Paris of America" idea which has flown abroad to the detriment of the town. He pointed out that when the mayor coined that catchy phrase he was compressing into three words the stuff of a wondrous vision of culture. And he painted what was in the mayor's mind. The Louvre of Paris, the British Museum of London, the Acropolis of Athens, the Borghese of Rome and the Golden Horn of Stamboul were some of the elements of the dream which McCarthy wished to make a reality in this city. It was an eloquent speech and I must say that if the airy visions conjured for the assembled cits by the impassioned orator actually passed before the mind's eye of Mayor McCarthy he's more of a poet than I suspected—yea, more of a poet than Doc Taylor who preceded him in office.

Emerging from Umbrage

The Rev. Charles R. Brown, pastor of the First Congregational Church of Oakland, has been smoked out as it were; not out of his pulpit, but out of the covert of reticence to which he took himself some time ago. "It is true," said Dr. Brown to a reporter the other day, "that I have decided to resign as pastor of the First Congregational Church, and that the matter will be formally brought before the members next Sunday, but I am greatly surprised if the report has become current inasmuch as I have not yet conferred with the church trustees." I am curious to know why Dr. Brown should say that he "is surprised if the report has become current." He knows that the report has been current ever since I put it in currency a month or so ago. I surprised Dr. Brown in the midst of his somewhat surreptitious preparations for an early departure hence. And two weeks ago corroboration of the report that Dr. Brown had his ear to the ground for a "call" came to us in the form of a press despatch from Boston to the effect that he was being "considered" for the presidency of Brown University. "Naturally," says Dr. Brown, "I am not at liberty to give out my reasons for the change, as my first consideration is to the congregation and the trustees, who are not yet aware of the intended step." Though reluctant to indulge in invidious comments, the thought presses on me for utterance that when a minister of the gospel feels himself impelled to throw up his job, he should also feel impelled to prepare his flock for the separation that steps might be taken toward engaging a new shepherd. However Dr. Brown may have substantial reason for enveloping himself in a cloak of silence. Far be it from me to pass judgment on him with anything resembling the precipitous haste with which he in one notable, memorable instance, unmindful of the biblical injunction, "Judge not lest yet be judged," saw fit to pass judgment on his neighbors. On the tip-toe of expectancy I patiently look forward to the fulfillment of Dr. Brown's promise to make the truth "public in properly and orderly fashion." Dr. Brown has some interesting revelations to make.

His Vague Denial

Since writing the foregoing I have seen another printed interview with Dr. Brown in which he changes he would suggest were confined to the first scene. Mrs. Atherton had not been too confident that her maiden dramatic effort would meet with approval and I know that if Mrs. Fiske had rejected it she would not have offered it to any other actress. It is more than likely that she would have tossed it into the crucible and brought it out a novel. So it must afford her unusual delight to discover that she possesses the dramatic talent as well as the novelistic one. By the way, the scene of "Julia France" is laid on the West Indian Isle of Nevis which Mrs. Atherton has made familiar to readers in "The Conqueror" and "The Gorgeous Isle." One scene of the play is in Bath House which has been rehabilitated as a result of the interest excited by "The Conqueror" and is now a popular resort.

The Ex-King's Uncle in Town

The fact that we have had in San Francisco during the past week Prince Ferdinand Francois, Duc de Montpensier who is the uncle of young Manuel, the exiled Portuguese king, did not create much of a stir, even among our tuft-hunters. Notwithstanding his Orleans connections the duke seems to have made no particular knick in the wall of our local aristocracy. Our untitled aristocrats seem to care not a fig for the duke and there can be no doubt that the duke cares not a dry prune for them. Notwithstanding which the duke had a pretty good time while he was in our midst. He went to the Columbia one night to see "Three Twins" and was enchanted with the chorus. Between the acts he signified that it was the ducal pleasure to be taken behind the scenes, and Jake Gottlob who has met many dukes in his time and likes them all construed the wish as a command which it would be lese-majeste or treason or at any rate discourtesy to disobey. So the duke was taken behind, and he evinced the liveliest satisfaction when he was introduced to the shapely young women of the chorus. He overflowed with compliments in the Latin manner and when he left all the girls said he was "a good kid."

The Duke and the Countess

The duke of course is traveling incognito, as becomes a youngster—he is not out of his twenties—who wants to see the world and have his fling. But he is traveling in ducal splendor just the same. There are several people in his party including one very beautiful and very accomplished woman upon whom the duke lavishes a wealth of attention. This is not the duchess, for the duke is not married; in fact her titular rank is inferior to the duke's, but that does not seem to lessen his regard for her. She is the Countess de Brionde. The countess accompanied the duke to this city on his first visit two years ago and her status at that time was a matter of considerable speculation. One of the waterfront reporters who interviewed the duke on his arrival from the Orient thought that she must be his duchess, but the duke denied this with excited shakings of the head. When he had explained that she was a countess without thoroughly enlightening the newspaperman, he finally exclaimed in despair: "The least said about the countess the better." And that seems to be the rule which is followed in the ducal party.

Her Polyglot Charm

A woman of great cultivation is this Countess de Brionde. One evening she was seated at a table in a hotel dining room with some local people who were held in a spell by her conversation. She began a story—in French. As the excitement of the narrative overcame her she lapsed into Italian and finally ended the story in Spanish. From this it may be inferred that the Countess de Brionde is not only an accomplished linguist but a dexterous hand at exhibiting her polyglot accomplishments. The countess is also full of appreciation for kindnesses done her. She had occasion to consult Captain Morton of the Mongolia about the fittings of the staterooms reserved for the ducal party and to acknowledge his courteous treatment she sent him as a present a handsome victrola. The countess is several years the senior of the duke but she is only in the thirties and therefore her charms are at their height.

Our Versatile Ex-Mayor

Some centuries ago a man of letters by the name of Horace observed that there was one thing which neither gods, nor men, nor book-stalls would tolerate in a poet—and that was mediocrity. When the other day I found that our old friend, Dr. E. Robeson Taylor had again broken out in verse it immediately occurred to me that Horace was wrong inasmuch as it appeared that our ex-mayor was tolerated in the shop of Paul Elder. But after reading "Lavender and Other Verses" I discovered that they failed to afford proof of an Horatian error. For Dr. Taylor isn't a poet. What the good man has written is in the sonnet and other poetic forms, but it isn't poetry. His verses are nothing more than the expression of the serious interest in life of a dilettante who has dabbled in medicine, law and politics, and who has served his generation in much more important capacities than those of poetaster and translator of poets. Now I know very well that in the Bohemian and Sequoia clubs Dr. Taylor is reputed to be a poet, but the delusion is one which I see no reason to encourage. On the contrary the dissipation of it I conceive to be a solemn duty, and therefore I will assure those of my readers who have not read Dr. Taylor, and who do not intend to read him, that what is printed in the beautiful book published by Paul Elder is a collection of rhymed compositions, which are not made up of best words in their best order, but of poor words in disorder, and therefore, according to Coleridge's standard they are neither good poetry nor bad prose. This is no idle dictum uttered in a querulous spirit, as you shall see. Let us examine Dr. Taylor's title piece, which presumably he regards as a very fine specimen of his workmanship:

said. Also do I submit that nothing could better illustrate Dr. Taylor's lack of poetic temperament. Here we have Dr. Taylor seeing a purple flower on a poet's grave and confessing that it reminds him of nothing but dry goods that have been fragrant with it and of the domestic uses to which it was put by his mother. Evidently Dr. Taylor has very little feeling for nature, just a little more than the man to whom a primrose by the river's brim is a yellow primrose and not anything else. Not to be hypercritical, but by way of bearing out the assertion that Dr. Taylor doesn't use good words I am constrained to challenge his "fragrances." As a plural it ranks with "excellencies."

His Sympathy With a Thief

If much substantial excellence was to be found in Dr. Taylor's verses it would be puerile to discuss his defects of a paltry and obvious kind, but the truth is that the most prejudiced admirer would have some difficulty in finding treasures in his pages; beauty or sublimity; high thought or deep passion breathed either in sweet or solemn sounds. His verses are mostly studies in fancy, but he weaves no airy shapes, no spell of magic "in tones and numbers fit." He is seldom anything but maudlin or commonplace or both, as for example when in the role of attorney for a thief he pleads heredity:

O wretched youth, such knowledge bids us feel
'Twas in your very bones that you should steal,
And murder even for sufficient cause.
O God of all the thunders, why impose
On helpless man immitigable laws, etc.

This is worse than near-poetry; it is nonsense. Why should the instinctive criminal, subject to immitigable laws require sufficient cause to commit murder? As a legal proposition, Dr. Taylor should know, the idea is absurd. There cannot be sufficient cause for murder, though there may be for homicide. But Dr. Taylor isn't always so dull and prosaic as we find him in "The Thief." Sometimes he versifies the mood of a day in pretty smooth metre and with some felicity of diction, but his words are not the fruitage of a luxuriant imagination. He is sentimental, but having no firm hold on the world of imagination he never rises to a great height. He gives us in his verses the records of his mild enthusiasms without ever revealing himself at the mercy of his impressions.

Pointing With Pride

In a little note Dr. Taylor addresses his readers on the subject of certain translations which he has made, assuring them that they are reproductions of the originals, following them in form and rhyme arrangement. This he tells us in the only proper way to translate poetry, and he adds that the difficulties are enormous. This note, I confess, prejudices one against our scholarly ex-mayor. The true poet is my judgment is never in quest of tribute or of alms. When he courts a reward he is more of a politician than a child of the muses. Incidentally it should be observed that Dr. Taylor is wrong. For far more essential than rhyme arrangement in a translation is insight and sympathy. If literalness be the test rhyme should be eschewed. Milton's translation of Horace's Ode to Pyrrha, once accepted as a model translation, is no longer so regarded by scholars because of its literal rendering and close adherence to the Latin order of sentence which our want of inflection makes ambiguous and absurd.

A Great Chance for the Polloi

With a lively consciousness of the unmitigated joy I am about to impart to the multitude which stands outside the hieratic tabernacle of society yearning to break in and join the rapt worshippers at the shrine of exclusiveness, I hasten to make the announcement that the homes of four of our top-notch families are about to be thrown open to the gaping gaze of the vulgus. Miss Margaret Kemble, a woman whose knowledge of modern music and musical tendencies has often been demonstrated in this city, is to give four "soirees on modern opera," but instead of giving them in a public hall, as she has done in the past, she will utilize the homes of four of her patronesses. The first will be given at the home of the William G. Irwins before this issue appears; the second will be given beneath the Rudolph Spreckels roof-tree; the third at the Emma Shafter-Howard domicile; and the fourth in the drawing room of that feminine Maecenas, Mrs. Eleanor Martin. Now here is an opportunity to gratify curiosity and culture at one and the same time and I make no doubt that it is an opportunity which will not have to knock twice at the doors of the climbers to arouse them to a realization of its value. No scholar of classic lore ever yearned to penetrate the Eleusinian mysteries or the secret rites of Bona Dea with the intense yearning wherewith the genus climber sighs to cross the thresholds of these homes. Miss Kemble is a public benefactor; she is imparting the open sesame to cars that have been stretched to catch the mystic syllables through countless weary seasons. And now at last the chance has come to rush in and have a peek at exclusiveness in its own preserve.

Society Actually Applauded

Those who have enjoyed the tremendous privilege of attending the concerts of the St. Francis Musical Art Society are aware that just as soon as the fashionable music lovers assemble the mercury drops to the freezing point. Frigid functions indeed are these and many an artist has shivered when facing the cold collection of visages belonging to our aristocracy. But when Signor Scotti and Madame Pasquali gave the concert of this high-toned society last Tuesday night a phenomenon occurred which it would be a shameful neglect of historical justice not to put on record. Be it known that on this auspicious occasion the patrons of the society actually applauded. They smote their palms together in evident enjoyment of the music and as the night was oppressive and many had doffed their gloves the noise of the applause was audible. The news of this strange happening flew about town very rapidly and since that wonderful night everybody who is anybody has heard the story of the applause that broke the traditions of the St. Francis Musical Art Society.

An Evening of Poetry

Sitting at the feet of Miss Agnes Tobin last Tuesday night the members of the Caedmon were steeped in poetry, while before them the universe of thought and imagination shifted its wondrous pageant. The occasion was that of Miss Tobin's lecture on the Poetic Renaissance of Ireland. The lecture was itself a poem. For its effect on the emotions was that of poetry—elevating, entrancing. Miss Tobin's lecture was illustrative rather than what may be termed discursive. She permitted the poets of Ireland, first of the Pagan, and then of the Christian, period to speak for themselves. Approaching the shrine of Irish poetry like a familiar worshiper she invoked its spirit and made the waves of air dance to the music of its melodies and sparkle with its brightness. A poet herself, bubbling over with the poetic temperament she exhibited a true sensibility to excellence and a feeling in unison with it which she imparted to her audience. It is evident that Miss Tobin knows the region of spirit, the shadowy world. The sensitive beings that have wandered there she introduced to us in the vehement and impassioned heat of their conceptions. Of the literature of Pagan Ireland she gave us some singular specimens, full of bold metaphor, exhibiting passages of forceful and rapid description; holding a character of their own. Then she introduced us to the modern world, mingling merriment and tragedy and giving us a peep into a dreamland with its phantoms coming and going on love's service. So it was an evening full of poetry, and a most enjoyable one it was.

The First Display of Winter Finery

The first real display of winter costumes took place at the Ives-Scribner wedding last week. One of the most striking was the blue and gold combination worn by Mrs. Frederick Fenwick. It was of the new shade "oieul bleu," in soft chiffon draped over a foundation of gold. The effect was unusual and pretty. Mrs. M. H. De Young wore a rather splendid creation of ruby velvet fresh from Paris. The gown of her daughter, Mrs. George Cameron, harmonized with it, being of deep American Beauty chiffon with bands of embroidery. For her-going-away costume Mrs. Scribner wore a dull blue silk trimmed with sable and a blue hat. As matron of honor, Mrs. Henry Crocker looked unusually well in one of the most graceful draped effects at the wedding. It was of soft pale blue satin over which was a broad scarf of white marquisette embroidered in gold. It was caught about the skirt, the ends falling into the short train. She wore a large black velvet hat with plumes.

The wedding presents sent to Mr. and Mrs. Othello Scribner filled the Ives cottage to overflowing. They were a wonderful collection of silver table utensils, crystal and jewels. The bride is a sensible and charming woman who has always been genuinely liked and her friends found a pleasure in sending her the conventionally required things. The groom was generous. In addition to a limousine he presented his bride with some handsome jewels including the pearl necklace of two strands which she wore at the wedding. Another of his offerings was a cabuchon sapphire of remarkable beauty, to be worn either as a brooch or pendant. The five Crocker children, nieces and nephews of the bride, presented their aunt with five silver baskets, and there were literally dozens of silver plates and platters. Mr. and Mrs. Scribner are en route to Europe to spend a three months' honeymoon.

Miss Winn's Debut

Thus far Miss Dora Winn, the attractive young girl who made her debut on Saturday, October 23, holds the record for popularity. She received by actual count one hundred and two boxes of rarest flowers on the occasion of the tea given by her grandmother, Mrs. Geo. Boardman. Miss Winn wore a white chiffon frock over pink. She was assisted in receiving by many pretty debutantes, among whom were Miss Constance McLaren, Miss Myra Josselyn, the aristocratic looking Lee Girvin and Ethel Mary Crocker, who was beautifully gowned in a most becoming New York creation of a pretty red color and who attracted, as usual, a great deal of attention. I'm told the palm must be yielded to Mrs. Boardman for having given the most elaborate tea so far during the season. The decorations and flowers were a rare tribute to the artists' skill. The present abode of the Boardmans where they have lived since the fire was formerly the home of Mrs. D. Atherton, mother of Mrs. Edward L. Eyre. It is a quaint house in the old style of Spanish architecture. Miss Dora Winn's mother was formerly Miss Dora Boardman whose death occurred at the time Miss Winn was born. She has always resided with her grandparents. After the death of George C. Boardman Mrs. Boardman and her granddaughter Miss Winn went abroad and have only recently returned. A great deal of entertaining will take place this winter at the Boardman home.

A Wedding Announcement

A distinct surprise to society will be the announcement of the engagement of Miss Alice Jackson Barber, eldest daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. William Barber of Ross Valley to Mr. Floyd-Jones of Indianapolis. Following closely upon the announcement will be the wedding which is to take place on Sunday afternoon at the residence of the bride in Marin County. Only relatives and a few intimate friends will be present. The late William Barber was one of the ablest lawyers of his day and on his death a few years ago left a large fortune to his wife and two daughters, the Misses Alice and Mary. Mrs. Barber was a member of a prominent Boston family. She was a cousin of Ralph Waldo

Emerson and her father Dr. Jackson of Boston was a noted scientist who discovered "ether." The handsome old home in Ross is one of the landmarks of that exclusive borough. Since the death of their parents the Misses Barber have resided there and entertained in a quiet way members of the ultra smart set. Miss Mary Barber owns an attractive cottage in Bolinas where the two sisters spend their summers.

Lathrop had been saying of the future of the East Tuesday, and will sail soon for England. Mrs. Lathrop wields a very daring pen and her people on this side of the water; for she has been visiting in the United States for more than a year studying the American woman and will place her in a book to be known as "Types of American Women." Mrs. Lathrop, it is said, has made it a point to study every type of American woman, from the queens of the drawing room to the dance girls of the Barbary Coast. Mrs. Lathrop paid the San Francisco women a great compliment when she remarked that of all the women of the world she had met in her travels, she considered the San Francisco women possessed the most beautiful speaking voices and most pleasing accent.

Why They Married

Conversations should never become a conversational topic. They should allow us to keep our illusions. In the theater it is delightful to hear players discourse of the divine passion, but off the stage it is apt to be disappointing. Take Mr. and Mrs. Howard Hickman (nee Bariscale) for an awful example. They made the mistake of talking to a dramatic critic about their thus Hickman: "You selected me because I said you had pretty feet. I met her first when we played together in 'Old Heidelberg' at a benefit for the San Francisco sufferers. She didn't remember me the next time we met, but I had her number, all right, on account of her feet. I recollect telling her then what a neat pair of pumps she had on." And is it thus that actors make love outside the playhouse? Pretty feet! Neat pumps! Has love struck an alliance with the bootmaker? Romance has ceased to be orthodox; it is orthopedic.

Emma Nevada's Daughter in London

One of the heralded opera singers who is taking part in the current season of grand opera at Covent Garden in London is none other than Mignon Nevada, the daughter of our own Emma Nevada. Madame Nevada's daughter has grown to be a graceful and beautiful young woman and seems to have acquired quite a reputation. She made her Covent Garden debut recently in the opera of "Hamlet," singing the role of Ophelia. In noticing her approaching appearance the London Illustrated News spoke of her as "the much bepraised" who was "said to be an Admirable Crichton in petticoats." Evidently London has been told things about this young woman which have not yet penetrated the West. What can she have accomplished to warrant the designation of an "Admirable Crichton in petticoats"? The opera season at Covent Garden is being managed by Thomas Beecham of the famous pill family.

Lathrop had been staying at the Fairmont since her return from Del Monte, but departed for the East Tuesday, and will sail soon for England. Mrs. Lathrop wields a very daring pen and her next book will be looked forward to anxiously by the people on this side of the water; for she has been visiting in the United States for more than a year studying the American woman and will place her in a book to be known as "Types of American Women." Mrs. Lathrop, it is said, has made it a point to study every type of American woman, from the queens of the drawing room to the dance girls of the Barbary Coast. Mrs. Lathrop paid the San Francisco women a great compliment when she remarked that of all the women of the world she had met in her travels, she considered the San Francisco women possessed the most beautiful speaking voices and most pleasing accent.

Why They Married

Actors and actresses should shun love as a conversational topic. They should allow us to keep our illusions. In the theater it is delightful to hear players discourse of the divine passion, but off the stage it is apt to be disappointing. Take Mr. and Mrs. Howard Hickman (nee Barriscale) for an awful example. They made the mistake of talking to a dramatic critic about their domestic romance. "How did I ever come to pick you out?" asked Bessie Barriscale Hickman. And thus Hickman: "You selected me because I said you had pretty feet. I met her first when we played together in 'Old Heidelberg' at a benefit for the San Francisco sufferers. She didn't remember me the next time we met, but I had her number, all right, on account of her feet. I recollect telling her then what a neat pair of pumps she had on." And is it thus that actors make love outside the playhouse? Pretty feet! Neat pumps! Has love struck an alliance with the bootmaker? Romance has ceased to be orthodox; it is orthopedic.

Emma Nevada's Daughter in London

One of the heralded opera singers who is taking part in the current season of grand opera at Covent Garden in London is none other than Mignon Nevada, the daughter of our own Emma Nevada. Madame Nevada's daughter has grown to be a graceful and beautiful young woman and seems to have acquired quite a reputation. She made her Covent Garden debut recently in the opera of "Hamlet," singing the role of Ophelia. In noticing her approaching appearance the London Illustrated News spoke of her as "the much praised" who was "said to be an Admirable Crichton in petticoats." Evidently London has been told things about this young woman which have not yet penetrated the West. What can she have accomplished to warrant the designation of an "Admirable Crichton in petticoats"? The opera season at Covent Garden is being managed by Thomas Beecham of the famous pill family.

Mr. Bennison of Alcazar Stock

Being an infrequent visitor at the Alcazar I am indifferently acquainted with the capabilities of the various members of this fine stock company, but on the rare occasions when I attend a performance in Sutter street I go away with a new admiration. On Tuesday night I discovered "Via Wireless" that the Alcazar possesses a splendid character actor in Mr. E. L. Bennison. To the regular patrons of the Alcazar this is probably well known, but that is no reason why it should be passed by with only casual reference. "Via Wireless" is a crackling melodrama with the usual array of serious and comic characters that seasoned stock players know by heart. But one character stands out in high relief. It is the character of a draughtsman in a steel plant, a gray-haired veteran of mechanics whose life has been devoted to the perfecting of a naval gun. Joy comes into his life when his invention is consummated, but sorrow follows on its heels when his son is blinded and killed by an accident at the works, an accident due to carelessness. Like so many inventors Marsh is a child in business matters and the inevitable villain of the piece finds it easy to trick him out of the larger part of his government royalties. The inventor balks when he finds that to assure the success of his piece of ordnance it will be necessary to distemper a rival gun that is being cast at the steel plant. Nevertheless he becomes an accomplice of the plot. When the rival gun is tested by the government it bursts, two men are killed and several terribly injured. The inventor's great scene comes at the end of the last act and it was in that scene that Bennison showed the acting stuff that was in him. Up to that point he had given a lifelike portrayal of the old man with the dull dreamy eyes of the inventor and the heavy plodding footsteps of the thinker. But in the last scene he electrified. A secret service man has been unwinding the plot and suspects that old Marsh and not the mythical person conjured up by the villain is the inventor of the gun. He cross-examines Marsh but the old man holds his tongue until he is reminded of the terrible accident at the government testing grounds. He thinks of the death of his son and his suffering is depicted in his face. At last he bursts forth, telling how he has been duped and tricked into the criminal conspiracy. With flashing eyes and heaving breast he denounces the villainy of his superior and tells how he has been haunted by visions of the innocent men who were killed like his own son. The pent-up passions of the man are poured out with amazing forcefulness but with no suspicion of overacting. You can see in his wild eyes and his disordered manner the sleepless nights that he has passed, wrestling with sorrow and despair and a guilty conscience. One does not expect an actor in stock to exhaust the possibilities of a character part. The rehearsals are few and the part of next week is forever crowding the part of this week. But Bennison has individualized this old man and lifted him above the melodramatic level of the play. He makes him dominate the performance. The character actor in a stock company could desire no greater success.

Max Dill at the Garrick

Ever since the famous team of Kolb and Dill was unharnessed by the lawyers speculation has been rife on the Rialto as to the probability of success or failure marking the efforts of the individual comedians. All such speculation was brought to an end in regard to one member of the team on Monday night when Max Dill reappeared on the local boards to go it alone in the game of fun-making. His success was instantaneous and exploded all the airy bubbles blown by the gloomy prognosticators of ill-fortune. Max Dill proved that he did not need a partner in the pleasant business of laughter. He has so many moods of mirth himself that he does not have to borrow from another. The mooted question as to whether a team may be divided without disastrous results was answered once and forever. It can—when Max Dill is a member of the team in question. "The White Hen" is a deliciously funny musical comedy with a "fat" part for Dill and very good roles for his support which includes Miss Beatriz Michelena, a young woman who has returned to the stage, more mature in her work than ever before, and Miss Lora Lieb, an easterner who seems likely to win a strong place in the affections of local theatergoers.

At he second concert (the only evening concert) t the Novelty Theater, Thursday night, Novem- er 10, Wagner will be represented by two scenes rom "Siegfried." The farewell concert is set or Sunday afternoon, November 13, at the Co- mbia when works by Schumann, Brahms, Max iebing, MacDowell and others will be offered nd the final part of the program will be devoted o scenes ffrom "Gottterdammerung."

A New York Success at the Alcazar

Another recent New York success, "The Little Gray Lady," will be given its initial presentation n San Francisco at the Alcazar, commencing ext Monday night. It is a comedy-drama by hanning Pollock who sub-titles it "A Play ithout a Hero." All its scenes are laid in ashington, D. C., at the present time and most f its characters are attaches of the Treasury epartment. By the Gotham critics it was con- sidered a luminous exposition of middle-class fe in the national capital deftly interwoven with an ingeniously conceived and cleverly told love story.

The Russian Barefoot Dancer

Countess Thamara de Swirsky, the Russian barefoot dancer, will begin her engagement in this city on Thursday evening, November 3, at the Valencia Theatre and will appear also on Friday evening and on the afternoon and evening of Saturday. The music for her dances will be supplied by a symphony orchestra under the baton of Mr. Herman Perlet. The Countess de Swirsky appeared before the critical audiences of the Metropolitan Opera House in New York and won their approval. She conquered also those who saw her dance at Newport. With these titles to consideration her reception in this city is sure to be favorable. The spectacular part of her dancing, naturally, will not be over- looked. The countess is said to distance all the other interpretative dancers in the scantiness of her attire. So her audiences may expect to be just a little shocked as well as entertained.

Barrymore and Rankin at the Orpheum

based upon a timely topic called "The White Slaver," written by Mr. Barrymore, at the Or- pheum next week. Rankin's name will live a long time in the history of the American stage and Barrymore is recognized as one of the cle- verest of the present-day leading men and a worthy son of his illustrious father, Maurice Barrymore. They are assisted by Miss Doris Rankin, a clever little actress and a daughter of McKee Rankin. "The White Slaver" was sug- gested by the recent agitation against the so- called "White Slave Traffic" under the leader- ship of John D. Rockefeller's son. It is a virile, human and extremely interesting story.

The Old Soldier Fiddlers who are genuine vet- erans of the Civil War, will be interesting. These old men wish to impress upon the public that they are not violinists but simply fiddlers, playing the same fiddles they sawed at long be- fore the Civil War. Among their tunes are "Devil's Dream," "Money Musk," "Captain Jinks of the Hoss Marines" and "Pop Goes the Weasel."

Frank Morrell, who is called "The California Boy," will appear in "The Singing Minstrel."

The Gus Onlaw Trio, Parisian wire perform- ers, have a world-wide reputation and the offer- ing they will present will be entirely new. The feminine member of the trio is fair Mlle. Fifi.

The Theatrical Charity Show

The big theatrical event of the year will take place at the Columbia, Friday afternoon, November 11, when the annual charity fund benefit under the auspices of the Associated Theatrical Managers of San Francisco will be given. This date has been chosen for the reason that all of the local theaters will have exceptional programs during that week and a bill of wonderful features will be presented. The local association of managers does a great deal in the way of alleviating distress among sick and unfortunate members of the profession and their fund at present is very low. That the public will respond and crowd the Columbia to the doors on the afternoon of the benefit goes without saying. Tickets may be obtained at all theaters.

"Conjuror's House" in Dramatic Form

The Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, announce for production next Monday evening "The Call of the North," the play in which Robert Edeson starred the season before last and which was written for him by George Broadhurst. Although never before seen here, the story and the characters in "The Call of the North" will no doubt be familiar, for it is founded on Stewart Edward White's "Conjuror's House." Sydney Ayres will appear as the adventurer and with him in the cast will be Muriel Hope and all the other Ye Liberty favorites. "Girls," Clyde Fitch's last comedy success, is an-

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The rise in values in the stock market during the past week is now being assailed by selling politicians and a disgruntled speculative public who have not been in sympathy with Wall Street in the betterment that has taken place. We have no better explanation to make (and doubt if any other is necessary) than to state that politics is possibly the least factor in the present Wall Street situation and the results of the election will be immaterial as to the future course of values. With the clearing up of the political uncertainties on November 8, we expect to see a slow but material improvement in the leading industries of the country which will result in a return to normal earnings in the leading corporations. We feel distinctly bullish on the Wall Street outlook.

Wheat—Viewed from a strictly domestic standpoint it is possible that substantial headway may be made within the next few months toward reducing the visible supply of wheat. This, however, would require unanimous action on the part of the producers in the way of holding their reserves. Such unanimity is not at all probable. Nevertheless there is a strong tendency in that direction, as has been evidenced recently by the letting off of primary receipts of wheat. The latter were nearly five million bushels less last week than for the corresponding week last year. There is apparently little hope of export business. Even Manitoba wheat which is relatively lower than American and has no hope of other than an export outlook, is being called for very sparingly by European buyers.

Corn—Pressure on corn similar in character to that which developed at the beginning of the year and oats harvest has been seen during the past week. Sufficient old and new corn has been contracted for in the country to force more or less hedging in the open market here. The comparative indifference of buyers meanwhile allows a limited outlet for that part of the big crop which must find its way to commercial channels in its original state. Overproduction in fact is apparent in corn as in wheat.

Cotton—The cotton market during the past week has been full of liquidation from all quarters and showed very little recuperative power. The weather in the early part of the week was dry, the frost line extending as far as middle Texas and causing some apprehension regarding the growing crop. Later in the week the weather became more favorable and virtually nothing was heard from the frost damaged districts, so that they have concluded that the reports were exaggerated. Spinners are out of the market temporarily and spots are accumulating at the primary southern markets. If the census report of next Tuesday shows more cotton than was expected to similar date last year it will probably be construed as a very bearish document as the crop is conceded to be very late and heavy ginning returns would therefore indicate a much heavier yield than those with bullish views have anticipated. We see nothing upon which to bull cotton at the moment and favor sales on every ten to fifteen points advance for a long pull.

Copper—The copper market is showing a reactionary tendency, although price changes in most instances have been confined to small fractions. Trading has not been particularly active and has been confined principally to the leading issues.

Local Securities—The local stock and bond market continues practically without feature, outside of a sustaining demand from eastern sources for California power stocks. About the most important news on the local situation during the past week was the report from New York that the Pacific Gas & Electric had leased the Western Power Company for 99 years and had agreed to pay the interest on the Great Western Power 5s as well as 5 per cent on Western Power preferred and 2 per cent on Western Power common, both commencing on January 1, 1912, the dividends on Western Power common to be increased 1-2 per cent per year until 7 per cent was reached when the stock would remain at that rate. This is regarded as a bull card for both companies, although the news has so far not been reflected in the market for these shares. Other local issues are about the same with a rather small amount of trade and a noticeable firmness in price when taken generally.

THOUSAND OAKS NOW READY

Splendid Drive Leads Direct From Oakland to Property

Already Thousand Oaks, the beautiful residence tract recently opened in Northern Berkeley, is taking its place among the finest home districts of the bay region. Since the completion of the Alameda, a continuation of Grove street, there is a direct boulevard drive from the heart of Oakland to Thousand Oaks, and many people who did not know the property heretofore are becoming acquainted with it.

There is no more beautiful spot in California than Thousand Oaks. It is an oak covered knoll scattered with moss grown rocks, and commands a magnificent view of the bay and the surrounding country. Each lot has an ideal building site and the whole property lends itself to distinctive architecture.

Several homes in Thousand Oaks are practically completed. Two of them are being erected at a cost of $8500 each, while a third will cost $6500. Other homes ranging in value from $5000 to $12,000 are to be built at once.

Duncan Comes Home

Armes, split his infinitives, indulged in such vulgarisms as "jest sech" for "just such" and expressed over and over again his pity for benighted San Francisco. Greek culture, he insisted, is the only salvation for the modern world and he sorrowed over us because we had never had the opportunity to see Greek statues or to witness Greek plays. It was a curious address and it spoke volumes for Duncan's mentality, proving conclusively that the "apostle of art and culture" had an intellectual equipment as bare as his calves.

Before closing his speech Duncan complacently referred the audience to the program for an explanation of the plot of "Electra." I read it and found that Duncan labors under the impression that Iphigenia was sacrificed by her father Agamemnon at Aulis. If Duncan's knowledge of the Greek tragedies extended beyond "Electra" he would not have made that mistake. He insisted too that the "Electra" was to be given with only such modifications in regard to the chorus as were necessitated by the difference between a Greek theater and a modern stage. But in this he misled his audience. It was too much to expect that the players would wear the mask and cothurnus or that the female roles would be played by men, but certainly it was natural to suppose that "the apostle of art and culture" would not mutilate the play. This he did wantonly. The chorus of "Electra" consists of ladies of Mycenae, but Duncan makes it a mixed chorus of men and women. More than that, he cuts out the noble speeches of the chorus and allows the coryphaeus to speak only when the dialogue requires it. To present a Greek play without the chorus is as bad as to give "Hamlet" without the Ghost. But he is more ruthless still. At the end of the play one of the most striking effects is eliminated. In the tragedy as written by Sophocles, when Aegisthus appears the scene opens to show the veiled body of murdered Clytemnestra which Aegisthus mistakes for the bier of Orestes until he lifts the covering. Duncan eliminates this, for what reason I am at a loss to explain. You might as well cut the play scene from "Hamlet." An arbitrary division of the tragedy into three acts helps further to destroy its spirit.

Duncan probably does not know that the students of the University of California have produced a Greek play. I had the pleasure of witnessing the "Eumenides" of Aeschylus as presented by them in the Greek Theater and I do not hesitate to say that in fidelity to the original and in the preservation of the Greek atmosphere the students were so superior to Duncan and his company that the comparison would be odious. Their reverence for the text extended to details not affected by the place of performance, for they gave the choruses as the dramatist wrote them and did not take liberties with his effects as Duncan did.

State of California,
City and County of San Francisco,—ss
On this 26th day of October, in the year one thousand nine hundred and ten, before me, L. H. Anderson, a Notary Public, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, personally appeared George W. Yost and Maude P. Diehl, known to me to be the persons whose names are subscribed to the within instrument, and duly acknowledged to me that they executed the same.
In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my Official Seal, at my office, in the City and County of San Francisco, the day and year in this certificate first above written.
(Seal) L. H. ANDERSON,
Notary Public, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, State of California. 10-29-5

As for Duncan's players it is not necessary to say much. One of them, Eleni Sikelianos, who plays Clytemnestra, is a very good actress and has considerable beauty. The rest stop short at mediocrity. As for Duncan himself, he speaks Greek with a high school accent in the part of Aegisthus and supplies an unintended comic interlude by his so called "lyric chorus dances." These comprise as funny a series of hops and slides and spins as I have ever seen on the stage. To watch the apostle of art and culture cavorting to the tum tum of some squeaky instrument is worth the price of admission but is not calculated to impress the spectator with respect for the Greek dances. If it were meant for a caricature of the Duncan uplift it could not be better done. It is interpretative dancing reduced to the absurd.

Was it worth while going to see Duncan? I don't think so. Those of us who love the classics do not care to see them treated with contempt or profaned by the ignorant and I am making the not unwarrantable assumption that the readers of Town Talk love the classics. To paraphrase the words of Thackeray with which I began, I feel that I will remember Duncan the way I remember castor oil.

Auto Notes

Monogram Oil made a clean sweep at the meeting at Santa Ana recently. Word was received at the local offices of the New York Lubricating Oil Co. to the effect that all but one of the cars that finished in the ten and twenty-five mile races used Monogram Oil.

That the name of Ralph Mulford will go down in history as the great racing driver of 1910 is the opinion of Calvin C. Eib, vice-president of the Pioneer Automobile Co. Mulford drove a Lozier in the three great events of the season.

Word has been received by E. P. Brinegar, president of the Pioneer Automobile Co., to the effect that Bluebird number "5," the car which won the Glidden Trophy, finished the Tribune endurance run with a perfect score.

Mr. E. G. Worden of Merced is in town on the last half of a round trip which he is making to Los Angeles and back in his Chalmers "30." He has made the trip thus far with absolutely no trouble and is most enthusiastic over the performance of his car which he has now run upwards of 7,000 miles. He has just changed his rear tires for the first time. He is still using the same tires on the front wheels.

Among the prominent automobile factory men scheduled to visit San Francisco soon is F. C. Chandler, vice-president and general manager of the Lozier Co. Chandler has made an enviable record in motor car circles and is particularly well known through his success in building up the big trade now enjoyed by the Lozier car throughout this country. Advices received by the Pioneer Automobile Co. state that Chandler who is now in the middle west will reach San Francisco by the first of November.

H. D. McCoy, secretary of the Chanslor & Lyon Motor Supply Co., has just left for Portland, Oregon, where he will assist in establishing the new Chanslor & Lyon store for that city. This will make the sixth house operated by the Chanslor & Lyon concern, the others being located at Los Angeles, Fresno, Seattle, San Francisco and Spokane.

B. L. Brown, a real estate man of South Pasadena, has a White Streak Buick which he has driven 17,280 miles in connection with his business. A Diamond tire which came as part of the original equipment of this car is still giving service. In writing to the local branch of the Diamond Rubber Co., Mr. Brown stated that this tire, which was the only Diamond to come with the car's original equipment, was the only one that gave above 6,730 miles.

W. C. Wood, general sales manager of the Chalmers Motor Car Company, and one of the best known automobile business men in the country, has been in San Francisco as a guest of E. P. Brinegar, president of the Pioneer Automobile Company. For several weeks he has been covering the territory west of Chicago and everywhere has been finding the same promising indications for the coming 1911 automobile trade and the same enthusiasm as well, for the new Chalmers models.

H. C. Ray, Visalia agent for S. G. Chapman, is in San Francisco making arrangements for allotments of Hupmobile and Oakland cars for the coming season. He reports trade prospects excellent for his section and is consequently contracting for much larger allotments for next year than he handled the year just closing. He will drive a Hupmobile back home this trip.

Jack Fleming, the noted local automobile racing driver, has just returned to town from the East where his work was one of the sensational features of the Vanderbilt road race. It will be remembered that Fleming's Pope-Hartford finished sixth well up toward the winner in spite of the fact that eleven tire changes had been necessary during the race.

Don't Buy a Discount Buy a Motor Car

There is a big difference between a cut price and a bargain.

An unknown broker might advertise a cut price on diamonds but that would not be a bargain. It would be a chance. Should Tiffany advertise cut prices on a diamond that would be a bargain. But Tiffany will not advertise such cut prices because Tiffany diamonds are real diamonds.

A cut Car either was not worth in the beginning what was asked for it or it has depreciated in value as compared with other cars selling at the same price.

CHALMERS CARS made the only cut in their prices when they were first built three years ago. Then they came on the market the first real automobile that ever sold for less than $1500. They have not found it necessary to make further cuts because they are genuine cars and their original price represented unusual value.

When you buy a CHALMERS you buy a Motor Car.

Letters

"First Love" Not Pleasant

John Bennett, aged twelve, takes a grip on the reader's affections. A forlorn little chap, he hides himself behind the curtains of all that is left of his home while the auctioneer disposes of the furniture, for John's father, recently dead, was prodigally extravagant, and now there was nothing left save this child, without a relative in the world and a mountain of debts which the proceeds of his effects would not cast even a shadow upon. Little John was scarcely of an age to appreciate the calamity and as he had been away at school for so long he hardly realized that his home was disappearing under his eyes. The one treasure which he longed to retain was a handsome prize rifle which had been presented to his sportsman father, and there was no one to whom the child could make an appeal. Doctor Brainerd who had constituted himself the little chap's guardian in memory of his mother, was well-to-do and unmarried. He had set his heart on preserving the dead woman's piano, but the gun meant nothing to him. To add to the little boy's humiliation there came now, at the eleventh hour, a Mrs. Bathurst who bid in this most precious relic and the heart-broken child hid himself away in his own room to be alone with his grief. Here Mrs. Bathurst found him and took him home to stop over night with her two young stepsons and here he discovered that she had bought the gun for him. Shy and dumb as lads of his age are apt to be, the child had not words with which to thank her but she became to him a goddess to be worshipped afar. He did not distinguish himself particularly either at school or at college, save in the athletic course and in an aversion to debt hardly to be expected of his parentage. He passed through the first sentimental period without coming to grief. Then some apparently worthless securities left by his father suddenly assumed a value which gave him a comfortable income, while his inclination to outdoor life kept him clean and wholesome so that at twenty-four, when he was graduated, he was healthy in mind, morals and body, and frankly indifferent to womankind. It was just after his graduation that he received an invitation to visit at the Bathursts again, the acquaintance having been kept up through the boys. During the intervening twelve years Mrs. Bathurst had been in Europe but was now returned to her American home where we are given a glimpse of her unhappy life with her boorish husband. This is supposed to excuse her transgressions. Young Bennett was to ride a horse belonging to Bathurst at the local horse show. Now the boy had a fund of unexpended sentiment. He had not a relative in the world and the memory of the gun episode and the invitation which had taken him away from his despoiled home had idealized the Bathursts. To him they stood for family, and all the chivalry in his make-up was called into play. He set his goddess on a pedestal. He rode magnificently, won the honors of the class, and then met with an accident which nearly ended his life. Mrs. Bathurst nursed him assiduously, petted and humored him and let him fall desperately in love with her. There is no particular harm thus far, for boys always do fall in love with women old enough to be their grandmothers. Mrs. Bathurst, we are told, had had her train of lovers during her long residence abroad. She is supposed to have suffered much and long from the infidelities of her husband but she can hardly be held altogether guiltless. The conventionally "happy ending," when, the objectionable Bathurst being dead and buried, his charming widow marries her old lover, leaving young Bennett, now the good doctor's heir, to find a mate and found a family of his own, does not by any means eliminate the evil from her former course. "First Love" is not a pleasant story. It is not a problem novel nor even a society parade but the exposition of the selfishness of a greedy woman willing to rob a child of his sweets in order to indulge herself, though she has already had too much. It leaves a bad taste in the mouth. Bobbs-Merrill Co.

A Good Citizen

A surgeon in a Western town, engaged to perform an operation of minor character upon a somewhat unsophisticated patient, asked him if he was willing to have only a local anaesthetic.

"Sure," replied the other. "I believe in patronizing home industry whenever you can."

"And you are experienced in compounding prescriptions?" asks the druggist of the applicant.

"Sure!" is the jaunty response. "I can mix juleps, gin rickeys, sherry flips, plain and old-fashioned toddies, twenty kinds of cocktails, all the bracers there are, and—"

"Great Scott! Where did you learn pharmacy?"

"In Kansas in a prohibition county."

"You don't seem to print the results of the races."

"Yes, we do," said the editor of the Plunkville Palladium. "We have all the bankruptcy news."

Thousand Oaks

Berkeley

A $3,000,000 Electric Railway System for Thousand Oaks

Things are booming in the Thousand Oaks section of North Berkeley: Street graders are putting the finished touches to a net work of macadamized streets; contractors are working large gangs of men and teams laying sidewalks, gutters, sewers and water pipes; line men are putting up poles and stringing electric wires for lights and telephones, and gardeners are planting flowers in the parking strips.

Over at the circle three blocks away an army of Southern Pacific workmen are building a concrete tunnel through a hill between Berryman station and Thousand Oaks; the steam shovel has made a road bed down to Solano Avenue, where a union station will be located and in a short while the tracks will be laid.

Over among the oaks in this new residence park carpenters and builders are constructing several handsome and expensive homes.

Everywhere is activity.

The Southern Pacific is building three lines to Thousand Oaks and when completed, in early spring, one can entrain for the city every 7 or 8 minutes and reach the Ferry building in 35 minutes.

The Political Outlook

If a Democratic landslide should occur in this country next week it will occasion some heartburning but no great amount of astonishment. If we read the signs of the times aright they portend something in the nature of a political upheaval in some of the strongholds of the Republican party. In Ohio the indications are that Judson Harwin will be elected. In New Jersey Woodrow Wilson seems to be on the road to victory. In Connecticut, where the Democrats have nominated a distinguished jurist for Governor, the Republicans are fearful of a calamity such as that which gladdened the hearts of the followers of Jefferson in Maine. In New York, where Theodore Roosevelt is the issue, that eminent authority, Elihu Root admits that the Republicans have only a fighting chance. In California, a State that has repeatedly manifested in majorities its signal appreciation of a protective tariff, Republicans have come to be as perplexed about the essential elements of their faith as were the followers of St. Peter and St. Paul in Jerusalem of old; and almost as irreconcilable, too. This condition of affairs can hardly be conceived to augur well for the party. Indeed, if we may be justified in looking for testimony to the men most deeply concerned, the outlook is far from encouraging; judging from the manner and conduct of the Hon. Hiram Johnson and his followers it is positively disquieting. The emotions of these gentlemen are easily discernible. There is a notable deficiency of enthusiasm among them; whilst plainly to be seen is the irritation that comes from resistless opposition. The only transports they experience are those of rage and hatred. In the early days of the campaign when Mr. Johnson was elated by his success in the primary election, when dazzled by the luster of his triumph he could see no road that did not lead to the State capitol, buoyant were his spirits, his manner defiant, his language arrogant and contemptuous. His demeanor was that of the strenuous soul that despises cheap success and is warmed and inflamed by opposition. But how melancholy the transformation that time has wrought! Mr. Johnson's choler is still at the brim, but the subsidence of his haughtiness is a phenomenon unmistakable. Mr. Johnson is depressed. He has lost his poise. He appears to be in a chronic state of bad temper. The vehement reviler has been given to whining of late. He talks about the amenities of political campaigning, and deprecates the neglect of the punctilios of polemics. Forced upon the defensive in the character of warfare of his own choosing he calls the people to witness that his enemies are defaming him, and all the while his followers, or rather the men who hope to profit by his election, are demanding that his opponent be held accountable for the retaliatory measures which Mr. Johnson provoked in the days of his wild-eyed fury when to give color to his claims to superior virtue he went about practicing the gentle art of traducing his neighbors. Now if it is to be assumed that a candidate is likely to be sensitive to changes in public sentiment, the Republicans of California have reason to be disquieted. Their standard-bearer appears to realize that he has been waning in popular favor, that his hold on the imagination of the populace has relaxed.

Obstacles and Weaknesses

Mr. Johnson has afforded us a fine exemplification of the wisdom of the old proverb about persons that live in glass houses. With such a fragrant record as he has made for himself it was folly for him to enter upon a campaign of detraction and abuse. By so doing he not only put himself at a considerable disadvantage but he caused the light to be thrown on transactions which he must have devoutly wished to remain forever dark. He assisted in the impairment of his own reputation, and even though the people in one of their spasms of perversity should elect him Governor, he must forever suffer the consequences of his own rashness. But Mr. Johnson, we believe, is destined to defeat. We believe, too, that he has more to overcome than the prejudice inspired by his personality. He is confronted by obstacles the most portentous of which is the dissension that exists in his party; he is handicapped by weaknesses of which some are inherent in his platform, some peculiar to the faction that he represents. By his platform Republicans are virtually absolved from allegiance to their party. The more they study it the stronger must become the conviction that it is only nominally the platform of the Republican party. Plainly, though by indirection, it repudiates President Taft and Governor Gillett, the bona fide leaders of the party in State and nation. Emphatically it repudiates the principles of the Republican tariff under which this is the most favored of all the States in the Union. In the event of tariff revision the first items to be acted upon are lumber and citrus fruits, and yet the Republican party of California for the moment stands of record in favor of revision and reduction. And this is not the only objectionable thing to which the party is committed. Designed to captivate the long-haired and short-brained element in the citizenry of the commonwealth, the platform gives promise of antidemon legislation by pledging the party to bestow the elective franchise on the members of the W. C. T. U. Ordinarily platforms are nothing more than bait for the baitable; but when we inquire as to the sentiments of the men who have been pitchforked into the curule chairs of their party we find them in perfect harmony with those of their professed principles. We must give them the credit of consistency. In their platform, for example, there is no warm endorsement of the Taft administration; and according to Congressman Knowland, he and all other candidates have been instructed to say nothing in approval of the President. Candidates are also instructed to deal with the tariff as the platform deals with it. The platform is for woman's suffrage and also is the candidate for lieutenant-governor who abhors wine and would like to give the ladies a chance to banish it from our tables. As to the gubernatorial candidate we know that he has made out a case for himself, as he has the confidence of the official organ of the temperance people. So from these considerations it is evident that in this campaign the Republican party is somewhat bastardized. It certainly is not in a position to claim allegiance from Republicans on principle. Now, in view of the fact which is established beyond peradventure by Mr. Johnson's attitude before the primary election as well as by Mr. Theodore Bell's testimony, that the Republican candidate was prepared in the event of his failure to obtain the nomination to go over bag and baggage to the Democracy, is it likely that the apostle of reform will receive the support of anybody that nourishes a hearty detestation of cant and double-dealing?

Two Republican Newspapers

In view of the considerations set forth in the foregoing paragraph we are astonished at the conduct of our esteemed contemporary, the Chronicle, which recently with a wry face and considerable retching swallowed the dose prescribed by the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. After weeks of hemming and hawing; after emphatically affirming that the Hon. Hiram Johnson was persona non grata to all self-respecting Republicans; after repeatedly declaring that he was unworthy of the confidence of Republicans and unfit to occupy the gubernatorial chair, our esteemed contemporary comes out in favor of electing the improvised reformer to office. Nor does our esteemed contemporary deem it worth while to retract one syllable of its former criticisms. Not a word does it recant, not a phrase does it offer in modification of its strictures. In short our contemporary, rather than have the appearance of being disloyal to the G. O. P. makes of itself a motley to the view. The Chronicle is more intensely and consistently Republican than the party itself. In its fidelity to the party there is no acrobatic performance that it will not essay. Though we can sympathize with the emotions of our esteemed contemporary as it perfunctorily swings into line, we deeply regret that it has not taken a broader, more comprehensive view of the present situation. We regret that it has not followed the example of its equally zealous contemporary, the Times of Los Angeles. Editor Otis has not felt it to be his duty as a Republican to support Hiram Johnson. Immediately after the primary election the Times advised Republicans that they did not owe allegiance to the Lincoln-Roosevelt candidate, and that they would be justified in writing on the ballot the name of any man they deemed worthy of the gubernatorial office. It was because he expressed this sentiment that General Otis was described as a public enemy in brutal and revolting terms by Hiram Johnson in a public speech delivered a few weeks before the purchase of the dynamite with which the Times' building was destroyed.

The Roosevelt Menace

The Los Angeles Times is not the only Republican newspaper that is not supporting the Republican ticket in this campaign. In the East there are several Republican newspapers that regard the Roosevelt menace as the paramount issue, one that rises above all considerations of party advantage and addresses itself rather to the instinct of patriotism than to the spirit of partisanship. In New York no other issue is discussed. There it is assumed that in the event of the election of the Saratoga convention candidate Mr. Roosevelt will control the State delegation to the National convention in 1912. And apparently there is widespread apprehension. The people are being urged to look back upon the wide swath of destruction which Theodore Roosevelt's folly and propensities wrought upon his otherwise prosperous country, and they are being advised that there can be no effective or permanent restoration of the common industry and productivity until the morbidity of Rooseveltism has been eradicated from the body politic. If the Republican candidate is defeated the probability is that the eradication will be complete. So the question before them in New York is whether it is advisable to absorb more of the poison of jealousy, hatred and discontent which Mr. Roosevelt has sown with impartiality or return to peace, sobriety and steady habits and kill off the New Nationalism with all its quack reform and fictitious strenuousness. Mr. Roosevelt appears to have come to a crisis in his career. Amid the changing winds of fortune and the hurly-burly of events the modern Caesar finds himself on the eve of a Pharsalia.

A Blow to Home Industry

It is most unfortunate that at this time, in the midst of our campaign for the promotion of home industry, several of our prominent manufacturing firms should be indicted for violating laws designed to protect consumers of canned and bottled goods. We are told that the accused firms are guilty of only technical infractions of law. This may be so, but nevertheless great injury has been done not only to the violators of the law but to the industries of the whole State. The prestige of our manufactures has been impaired, and foreign competitors have been supplied with ammunition which they will use to our disadvantage. Criticism is not to be silenced by arguing, as the Chronicle does, that the officers of the law are unreasonable, insisting as they do on strict enforcement of a law that is susceptible of misconstruction. The answer to this is that if foreign manufacturers can live up to our law and do business here notwithstanding a protective tariff, our home manufacturers should not find it impossible to do business without inadvertently doing what is prohibited. It is not likely that Uncle Sam encourages foreign industry by discriminating against home products.

Moreover it seems incredible that if the law were complied with "jams and jellies would be placed beyond the reach of nearly every consumer." This, however, is what we are told by Charles H. Bentley of the California Fruit Canners' Association which has been indicted on four counts. The statement seems incredible because notwithstanding a protective tariff and the cost of freight there are firms in England that send their jams and jellies to this city and market them through agents who appear not to be in fear of arrest and at a cost that is not prohibitive. However, the matter is of great importance and is deserving of investigation. Our Home Industry League should take the matter up before spending too much time in propagandic work. Among other things the League should urge the State authorities to enforce our own pure food laws rigorously and to take steps toward improving the prestige of all our manufactures. For while the firms that have been indicted may be guilty of only "technical" violations of the law, it is a fact that the ingenuity which was once applied to the manufacture of wooden nutmegs is still available and not universally abhorred in the commercial world. There are manufacturers who have yet to learn that prestige is an asset that can be easily alienated, and that it is not advisable to trifle with the public by lowering the standard of a commodity after it has won its way on merit. In this State, the name of which is identified with many products, it is of great importance to home industry that no get-rich-quick firm should be permitted to do business on the principle by which carbonated wine is sold for champagne. Our Home Industry League should aim to make the shibboleth "Made in California" respected the world over.

Burning the Letters

Dear perjuries I loved so well,
Dear dead believing

Blistered with hot and happy tears,

Dear yellowed leaves, dear faded words,
The red flame flashes—
No elegy I speak but this:
Ashes to ashes.

Who's Blythe---And Why

Being a Short Account of the Career of a Newspaperman Who Has a Weekly Reading Public of Ten Million Americans—
Mr. Samuel G. Blythe of the Saturday Evening Post.

By Edward F. O'Day

Knowing our Shakespeare—and bless you, how well we do know our Shakespeare—we readily recall that interesting occasion in Rome when our old friend Jule Caesar sized up the crowd that was trailing him and remarked to Brutus that he would like to have men about him that were fat. Without refreshing our memories from Bartlett's nifty little manual—a thing we never never do—we also remember that Jule reinforced this request by demanding that they be sleek-headed men and such as sleep o' nights and warming to his subject, he became just a trifle personal and dropped a remark to the general effect that Cassius had a lean and hungry look (due, I suppose, to the high cost of living in Rome). With these Caesarian animadversions in mind I hasten to remark that dear old Jule would have been delighted with Sam Blythe. Now do not for a moment labor under the misapprehension that Sam Blythe is sleek-headed. Far from it. He hasn't a single Raymond Duncan characteristic that I know of. And please do not conclude that Sam Blythe is strong on sleeping o' nights. Being a newspaperman he does most of his sleeping in the daytime. But despite the absence of these requirements I arise to reiterate the assertion that Sam Blythe would have made a three-base hit with Julius. You have guessed it. Sam Blythe is fat. Not that Sam is of Gargantuan or Falstaffian or Tomreedian fatness. In an adipose contest with Bill Taft he wouldn't get many obesity prizes. He cannot even boast that plenitude of embonpoint that precedes our own Colonel Kowalsky and announces his coming before he enters a room. Let it be conceded right here and now that there are a whole lot of fatter men in the world than Sam Blythe. But it is not down in the book that J. Caesar went to extremes in his fondness for larded rotundity. Come right down to it, he was no great shakes in the matter of cushiony corporosity himself, so I insist again, this time with a fine scorn for any possible contradiction, that it should and must be taken as a proven proposition that Caesar would have been amply content with the fatness of Sam Blythe.

And that is where Julius would have made one grand error. I take it that when he went out of his way to rap Cassius about his lean and hungry look he was sort of hinting that he was wise to the said Cassius' tricks. It was a diplomatic way of conveying that he, Julius, would take it as a personal favor if Cassius would devote more time to eating and sleeping and a great deal less to building up a rival political machine. As we know from Bartlett—I mean Shakespeare—the hint was not taken and Cassius got his revenge a few days later by walking up to Julius with a lot of other perfect gentlemen and sticking him in the region of the fifth rib. And poor Julius died thinking that if he had had men like Sam Blythe around him his decease would have been postponed. Which shows how little Caesar knew about fat men or at least, about the particular run of fat men to which Sam Blythe belongs. The object of Cassius and the rest of the conspirators being to smash Caesar's political machine to make room for their own, they would have found Sam Blythe invaluable. If Sam had been along they would never have been reduced to the messy expedient of puncturing Julius and getting his blood all over Pompey's statue, for Sam is one of our handiest little puncturers and one of our cutest little smashers but he punctures Caesars with a pen and smashes political machines with a typewriter, a method which may seem less gory but which nevertheless spills a lot of bad blood.

Having proceeded thus far, let me stop short and set down the extremely obvious fact that I can't imitate Sam Blythe's literary style. Although I have been reading his "Who's Who—and Why" series in the Saturday Evening Post ever since he began writing it, I humbly confess that the foregoing is the best I can do in the way of mimicking his peculiarities of thought and speech, although I have tried very hard to turn the trick. It looks very easy, but now that I have attempted it for the first and last time, I am perfectly willing to admit that it is beyond me. That sincerest form of flattery which consists in imitation I cannot give to Sam Blythe, so I will content myself with a more pedestrian form of narrative.

Samuel G. Blythe has just been in San Francisco looking over the political situation. Those who have jellied with laughter over "The Adventures of a Hypochondriac," "The Master Problem" and other jeux d'esprit published under his signature know that Blythe is a natural humorist with a highly trained gift of expression. Those who have read his signed political articles recognize that he is the most expert political appraiser and the justest critic of all political parties and political factions in American newspaperdom. That is distinction enough for one man, but Blythe has more. The most widely read productions of his pen are published anonymously. These comprise the "Who's Who—and Why" series, the "New Reporter" series and the "Senator's Secretary" series, all published in the Saturday Evening Post. Have you ever noticed how many people open to the "Who's Who" page as soon as they buy their Post every Thursday? That is the greatest tribute to Blythe's ability. The Saturday Evening Post has a circulation of two millions a week which means that it is read weekly by about ten million people. All of these ten millions read Blythe. That, too, is something of a tribute.

On last Saturday I had a very interesting chat with Blythe and he told me the story of his newspaper career. It is a valuable story because it has a valuable moral. The moral, drawn by Blythe himself, simply, sincerely and without any suggestion of affectation, is the time-honored moral that success only comes by hard work. Blythe has gradually evolved success—tremendous success—by carefully cultivating the gifts with which nature provided him, and in conversing with him you realize that far from being satisfied with his technical skill, he is aiming all the time to perfect his mastery of the English language. It is needless to say here that in proportion to Blythe's success has been his financial remuneration. I suppose his income is larger than that of a best-selling novelist.

Twenty-four years ago Samuel G. Blythe was a youngster of seventeen living in the town of Geneseo, New York. His father ran a little paper there and Blythe wrote "locals" for it. That is to say, he used to go down to the depot when the train came in and find out the names of the drummers who had dropped into town and do other journalistic feats of an equally portentous nature. But one day there was a murder in the neighborhood and Blythe had the ineffable pleasure of helping a real blown-in-the-bottle reporter from Rochester to cover it. When he had recovered from the awe with which the acquaintance of a simon-pure reporter filled him, he decided to become a genuine newspaperman himself, so he went up to Rochester to get a job on a morning paper. He arrived at the office of the Democrat and Chronicle at eight o'clock in the morning and not knowing much about morning papers was surprised to find the shop deserted, but he stuck around for four hours and when he asked for a job he got it. They only paid him ten dollars a week but that seemed a lot of money to Blythe, and having brought the Geneseo thrift with him to Rochester he saved enough in a year to buy a half-interest in a little paper at Adrian, Michigan. Of course that venture failed and after working in Geneseo, Wheeling, Galveston and a few other places a thousand or so miles apart he went back to Rochester for fifteen dollars a week. You see he was getting along. He was the sporting and dramatic editor and when there was no play in Rochester he contributed a column of "Sidelights on Life." These "Sidelights" had the seed that afterwards flowered into the "Who's Who" series. The editor of the Buffalo Express took a fancy to them, so Blythe went to Buffalo and did them for the Express for $25 a week. Then he became the editor of the paper and following the natural evolution of all good newspapermen, was fired and went to New York. For a couple of years he ran the Cosmopolitan Magazine but he didn't like the monthly field and one night when he walked home from a banquet with Van Benthuyssen of the New York World he expressed his dislike to that great newspaperman. The next day he was offered a job on the World and when he informed Van Benthuyssen that the only place he would take was that of Washington correspondent, he got it. When Blythe had been a year in Washington he wrote a "Who's Who" article for the World. Of course it wasn't as good as the "Who's Who" articles he is writing today, but it was no doubt full of humor and kindly satire and those smashing and puncturing qualities which are not a bit less effective because they are draped in laughter and burlesque. The article was not published. Not discouraged Blythe wrote nine or ten more, but they never saw the light. Then one day by some accident for which Blythe has never been able to account one of these lucubrations got into type. It was read to old Joe Pulitzer and as Blythe had managed to extract the humor of a reciprocity debate then going on, it tickled the blind publisher's fancy and he inquired the name of the author. For the first time Pulitzer became aware of Blythe's existence and sent him a wire telling him to write some more copy of the same kind. Thereafter Blythe had a regular page in the Sunday World and everybody in New York acquired the habit of reading him. By an accident he had become famous—an accident of course—one of those accidents, however, that never happen to any but those who have the

The Potency of the Pull

Editor Town Talk: I have heard a great deal about the Dalzell Brown case, but have you heard about the case of Knoblock and Grossman? I believe not. Let me give you in brief this history, every word of which is supported by record facts. It will throw some light on the relations existing between Mr. Langdon and Johnson, and serve perhaps to make clearer the facilities our gubernatorial candidate enjoyed for putting through the deal by which Dalzell Brown was enabled to hold onto his loot without much inconvenience.

After a preliminary examination in the police court, held in March, 1907, Knoblock and Grossman were held to answer upon a felony charge. Thereafter Hiram Johnson made application for habeas corpus to Judge Murasky and was denied; whereupon he applied before Judge Cook for a writ of habeas corpus, and by Judge Cook both of the defendants were discharged. Nothing in Judge Cook's opinion declared that the evidence failed to show the commission of the felony charged. During the session of the next grand jury in January, 1908, a personal letter was delivered to Wm. H. Langdon from the firm of Campbell, Metson & Drew, enclosing a transcript of all the testimony taken upon the preliminary examination in the case of Knoblock and Grossman, enclosing a copy of the opinion of Judge Cook, pointing out that Judge Cook's opinion did not indicate in what respect the evidence failed to show the commission of the felony, declaring that Mr. Robert Harrison and Mr. Robert Duke, both assistant district attorneys, who participated in the preliminary examination and upon the habeas corpus proceedings, had expressed the opinion that the commission of the crime charged was clearly proven by the evidence. Notwithstanding this, Mr. Langdon refused to present the matter to the grand jury which was then in session, though Mr. Robert Harrison, his deputy, thereafter stated before the grand jury that he was of the opinion that a felony had been committed. Accordingly, no action whatever was taken by the district attorney to submit the matter to this grand jury. Thereupon the firm of Campbell, Metson & Drew themselves presented a summarized statement of the charge and of the evidence supporting it to Alonzo McFarland, the foreman of the grand jury, with a list of the witnesses, and a request that evidence be taken. This was done, and another indictment promptly returned against Knoblock and Grossman. On March 24, 1908, the day on which the evidence was taken, the firm of Campbell, Metson & Drew wrote Deputy District Attorney Robert Harrison a letter, courteously suggesting that, in the event that the grand jury voted an indictment, the firm would be glad to share the responsibility and lighten his labors by assisting in drawing the indictment. As the indictment charged fraud and as the facts were numerous and well known to the firm, they believed that they might be of assistance in the matter. No response was made to this letter. Hiram Johnson appearing again for both defendants, demurred to the indictment upon the ground that it was fatally defective. An examination of the indictment by the firm of Campbell, Metson & Drew convinced them that the indictment was so defective, and thereupon they wrote and delivered to District Attorney Langdon a letter, in which they stated their belief that the indictment was fatally defective, called attention to the fact that they had offered to assist in the framing of a proper indictment, and that their offer had been met with silence, pointed out specifically the defects in the indictment, by its omission to charge material matters, and said: "We take it that from the above you can arrive at but one conclusion, the indictment is insufficient and doubtless would be so held, even without the persuasive powers of an attorney of the accomplishments of Mr. Johnson, to whom the insufficiency of the indictment is plainly apparent, as will appear by reference to the demurrer filed by him." Further, the letter suggested that it would be advisable to confess the insufficiency of the indictment and obtain from the court a proper order for the resubmission of the matter to the grand jury, as the law provides; and, in this connection, stating further, "We beg to call your attention to section 1008 of the Penal Code, to the effect that the allowance of a demurrer to an information or indictment is a bar to another prosecution for the same offense, unless the court, being of the opinion that the objection may be avoided by a new indictment or information, directs the cause to be submitted to the same or another grand jury."

No attention was paid to this letter. The district attorney refused to follow its suggestion. The demurrer came up for argument before Judge Conley of Madera, sitting here in San Francisco, and was overruled. Months elapsed, when, after the disbanding of the grand jury, so that it would be impossible to have the matter referred to it again, Hiram Johnson asked and obtained leave to reopen the hearing of his demurrer, judgment upon which had been entered, before Judge Carroll Cook. This was done and the demurrer was promptly sustained, at a time when no grand jury was in session. Instead, then, of resubmitting the matter to the next grand jury, which was the last opportunity open to District Attorney Langdon to secure a valid indictment, he appealed from the order of Judge Cook sustaining the demurrer, notwithstanding that he was well advised, as has been shown, that the indictment was radically defective and that the appeal could accomplish no result but an affirmance. The matter was thus in abeyance until the decision of the district court of appeal rendered on the 17th day of September of last year. By the decision of that court the order sustaining the demurrer was affirmed. But, as though this were not sufficient, it is shown by the decision that the appeal was, either through the ignorance or intent of Mr. Langdon, so defectively presented, that it was impossible for the court of appeals to consider the question upon its merits, that court saying: "We are, therefore, obliged to affirm the order and judgment appealed from for want of any legal record from which we can determine whether or not the court erred in its rulings."

Here, then, is in brief the story of another and ingenious method by which immunity was secured to Mr. Hiram Johnson's clients. Is it longer any wonder that Mr. Hiram Johnson and Mr. Langdon have been ever ready to give each other a certificate of character, or that Mr. Johnson was ever ready to acclaim the ability and virtue of Judge Cook? And I would further ask, in view of their past relations, isn't it eminently proper that Mr. Johnson should declare that in the event of his election he will appoint Mr. Langdon to the position of Superintendent of Banks? True, Mr. Langdon has not had much experience as a banker, but I am sure that he may always rely on Mr. Dalzell Brown for a few pointers.

An Irishman Protests

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I went to the Savoy Theater on Sunday afternoon to see Dan Boyle free Ireland with his tongue. Dan is a "broth of a boy" indeed, for he talked $2,000 out of his audience. I myself didn't give him a cent and it was the first time in my life that I begrudged other men the right to spend their own money. And you can guess why when I give you an idea of Dan's speech. He said that conditions had changed in Ireland; that where the landlord used to evict the tenant the tenant now evicts the landlord. He said that Ireland had her land, her university, her old age pensions and her local county government, but she wants more. And what does she want? Home Rule, bless you, and she proposes to get it by beating the House of Lords into insensibility. That at least was the impression I got from Dan's explanation. He said that if the Lords were wise they wouldn't fight, but the foolish old peers actually refuse to give up peaceably, hence Dan's visit to America and his appeal for cash. Probably the lords are to be bribed to "throw" the fight. Of course Dan thinks the Irish will win; he points out that there are only 600 lords while there are 38,000,000 English and 5,000,000 Irish; from which I infer that England and Ireland are to rise 43,000,000 strong and throw the lords into the English Channel. Of course Dan referred to the battle of Fontenoy. All our Irish orators, including Frank Sullivan, are strong on Fontenoy. And then he passed the hat. That made me mad. Can't an Irish patriot come to America without bringing a subscription list with him? Must we Irish in America forever support a pack of lazy politicians who would starve if they hadn't their membership in an English Parliament to enhance the credit of their various money making schemes. Has anybody ever seen an audit of money raised in America to free Ireland? It would be a curious document, if correctly drawn up. Now, Mr. Editor, I believe that Home Rule, like Jeffries, can't come back and to keep the record straight I write this protest against Dan Boyle and his collecting trip.

Very sincerely,

—A Hibernian.

Siftings from Many Sources

Like the Army in Flanders

The nerves of the office seekers are all frazzled out. They are irritable, excited and too hot in the collar to pick their words with judgment. Take for instance this report of an interview with Hiram Johnson published in the Fresno Sunday Mirror which accuses the candidate of being a very profane man:

"Do you expect to continue making the charges that the special interests are behind Bell, Mr. Johnson?" asked the reporter.

"I certainly do, by ——!" answered Johnson.

"Well, do you blame Bell personally for that? You know that he is denouncing the corrupt interests that have dominated California's politics."

"Denouncing Hell! Why, —— it, he's right in with the —— dirty —— that have controlled California politically for thirty years. By ——! I'm a —— if you can tell me he's not."

"But, Mr. Johnson, isn't it possible that those interests are behind Bell because they want to be and not because of any solicitation on his part?"

"Why, —— it, no. Why, if he's opposed to the —— principles they represent, should they want him to be Governor?"

"I guess because they would rather see him there than you. They had no other choice unless they backed the Socialist or Prohibition candidate."

"Oh, ——! I tell you, by ——! that he's in with that bunch. Four years ago Bell fought Hearst and Herrin. This year he's already crawled on his belly to Hearst, and if he'll do that he'll crawl to Herrin."

To change the subject a little the reporter said:

"Without prejudice, Mr. Johnson, I believe that Bell has gained ground on you in Fresno County since you were here before. I have talked with men from many towns near here and they all say that Bell is growing stronger as the campaign nears a close."

"That's an un——ly, —— lie!" replied Mr. Johnson. "I'll carry every —— county in this State. I see that you're a Democrat. Well, by ——! I don't want your —— vote."

The Strain of the Campaign

The campaign which is now so near its close has been a strenuous one for the editors, and they are beginning to feel the strain. Editor Chester Rowell of the Fresno Republican has been saying unnice things about Editor McClatchy of the Sacramento Bee and the latter has been lambasting Editor Rowell for championing the candidacy of Congressman Englebright against John E. Raker of Alturas who would like to go to Washington next year. McClatchy says Rowell's paper has been misinterpreting the Bee and then he hits Rowell this thump in the brisket:

"And yet the Republican cannot be blamed.

When its editor, the Warwick of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League, parades up and down the State, his manly front unadorned with even the tiniest scarfpin from Consistency's great storehouse of jewelry, it must cause any editorial brain to wobble in its tracks as it endeavors to present the aforesaid Rowell on a level path."

In Stockton Too

In the metropolis of the San Joaquin they are at it hammer and tongs. Editor Cowell of the Stockton Mail is running for Congress against Congressman Needham who is receiving the support of the Stockton Independent. Note the unkind way in which the Mail handles the Independent:

"The dear old lady put aside her sewing to declare that it would be 'a great blunder' to send Mr. Cowell to Congress; and added, 'Don't take Candidate Cowell seriously.' Then, prithee, dear ancient maiden, why do YOU take Candidate Cowell seriously? Here you have sprained your poor, weak back in a supreme effort to express an opinion—you have spilled a tankful of words into your valuable editorial space—all with a burst of superhuman strength and wisdom. Because YOU take Candidate Cowell seriously. So does Candidate Needham. So does the intelligent voter. Hence your frantic but puerile splashing."

Noblesse Oblige Among Newspapermen

How some of these newspapermen do love one another! The San Francisco correspondent of the Stockton Mail, writing under the name of Menippus, says that the Johnson campaign has been badly handled. Then he illustrates:

"Some of the understrappers in the employ of the Central Committee have been making breaks that are hard to counteract. For instance, one of them wrote a circular letter last week in which the mysterious charge was made that the opponents of Johnson were raising a corruption fund to defeat him. Of course, the statement was manufactured out of whole cloth. There was not the slightest scintilla of evidence upon which to base it, and when the reporters tried to run down the story, Meyer Lissner, the State Chairman, declared that the letter had been issued without his knowledge or consent."

The "understrapper" who signed his name to the letter in question is H. A. French of the Johnson publicity department. Up to a short time ago he was the news editor of the Call and the Menippus of the Mail is likewise an editor of that paper. "Noblesse oblige" seems to be unfashionable in some newspaper offices.

The Practical Joke in San Berdoo

Down in San Berdoo the practical joke has been carried to a high stage of cultivation by a cow puncher with a sense of humor. One of his fellow workers is desperately afraid of snakes, so this funny cow puncher put a rope decorated with cactus leaves between the sheets of his bunk. When the victim of the witticism went to bed he thought he had been bitten by a snake and jumping up with a yell dashed into the open where the joker, to heighten the fun of the thing, took five shots at him and winged him in the shoulder. The victim is in the hospital trying to grasp the point of the jest while the jocular cow puncher is being trailed by deputy sheriffs.

It is possible that he will elude punishment by laughing himself to death on the desert.

Aeroplanes for the Army

Representative Hull, chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs, says that he will use every endeavor at the coming session of Congress to bring about an appropriation of at least $500,000 for development of a balloon and aeroplane service in the army. He says that the United States has been derelict, and that there should not be a moment's hesitation at the approaching session to supply the army with funds, that it may equip itself with this essential resource of war.

Dolliver Might Have Been President

George F. Authier, the political editor of the Minneapolis Tribune, says that the late Senator Dolliver told him confidentially, with permission to publish the story after his death, that Mark Hanna offered him the nomination for vice-president in 1900, but that he refused it as he expected to be elected United States Senator. Hanna finally induced Dolliver to allow the use of his name in the convention, promising to withdraw it when a suitable candidate had been chosen. But the Dolliver boom assumed large proportions and Hanna tried to get absolved from his promise. Dolliver, however, insisted on staying off the ticket and finally promised to use his offices to induce Roosevelt to accept the second place. He arranged a meeting between Hanna and Roosevelt with the result that Roosevelt agreed to run. If Dolliver had agreed to be a candidate he would have become president on the death of President McKinley and a great deal of recent political history would read differently today.

Blind

By Jean Reibrach (From the French)

"So, doctor," questioned the visitor, "you hope?"

"I do more, madame; I am sure."

"You hear, Suzanne?" said the blind man. "Sure! He is sure!" And his emotion, vainly repressed, broke forth. "Oh, to see! To find the world again, that world which has been lost to me for two years! But above all, to see you, my Suzanne—you who have been, who are everything to me and whom I scarcely know. To see you at last in all your beauty—your golden hair, your eyes blue as the sky is blue!"

The doctor let his eyes rest for a moment upon the young woman.

She was dark, having no other beauty than an expression of melancholy sweetness and of infinite tenderness.

But, her finger on her lips, she made a gesture of silence, and with a bow, the doctor withdrew.

The blind man, Andre Gevres, had been wounded by the explosion of a mine in a quarry.

The country house where Suzanne was staying at the time, was nearby and the workmen had carried the wounded man there.

Suzanne was free, a widow. A great pity overcame her in the presence of the young engineer, blind for the time being, and as he was without family, she had opposed his being taken to a hospital.

The devotion of which she felt herself capable could alone temper his despair, and she suffered with him, rendering his grief less terrible by sharing it.

She had surrounded him with the devotion of a sister; had lightened the night into which he was plunged by the cheering days of her tenderness. She who watched over him, who had consoled him, he had therefore associated in his mind with all the things he regretted unceasingly. She shared their beauty, and perceiving in her only the delicate tones of the voice, he had pleased himself by creating of her an image of light and fairness, and she, because the dream made him smile, allowed him, as one would a child, to believe in the vision of a blonde angel perched beside his couch.

Too late Suzanne discovered the direction in which this illusion was leading him; the emotion which the charming mystery caused the invalid, and the growing distress of the heart in which the need of love awoke despairingly.

How withdraw from him the hands he loved to press in his? How defend them from the grateful touch of his lips? Moreover, she herself no longer knew any limit to her immense pity, which little by little developed into love, until she gave to him her heart, her lips, her very soul.

Now, to mar the happiness of the promised recovery, rose the specter of the anguish which the deception would cause. The marvelous vision would merge itself into the commonplace image which the mirror reflected. Must she face the look in Andre's eyes, the look which would turn away to hide the disappointment and reproach for love stolen in the darkness? Or, worse yet, must she see Andre, through gratitude, simulate pity, even a love, which he did not feel? That, never! That was beyond her powers of endurance. The illusion of happiness, which had indeed meant happiness, had given back to Andre the desire, the will, to live. By it she had led him straight to the un hoped-for threshold of light. The task was accomplished. It was for her now to disappear. The world, reconquered, would console him.

Suzanne, her visit over, joined the doctor in his office.

"You heard," she said to him. "You know what the fancies of a sick person mean. This illusion, I beg of you to let him keep it."

With a sign of comprehension the doctor acquiesced.

The young woman herself hastened to combat a possible objection.

"The operation is much more likely to be successful if his mind remains undisturbed. Besides, if it should by any possibility fail, the disillusion would be irreparable. Only the joy of a complete cure can compensate him."

And with an infinitely sad, sweet smile, she added: "Therefore, if he speaks to you of me, I am blonde, my eyes are blue and I am beautiful."

Suzanne's resolution was so irrevocable that it left her quite serene. The discreet complicity of the doctor aided her. In this ecstasy of sacrifice she continued to follow the impulse, at once feminine and maternal, which had actuated her from the beginning. At the time of the operation, the maternal sentiment dominated.

The operation was successful and soon the cure was assured.

"In another week—" the doctor announced.

Complete darkness no longer surrounded the invalid and the faint light penetrated the bandage with a confused caress. As the great moment approached, Andre became grave and hesitant.

One day he said, "Suzanne, do you know? I tremble a little at the thought of seeing you at last. I tremble with an almost religious emotion."

Taking her hands, he drew her to him.

"Put your dear face close to mine. These are childish things which I am going to say to you, but a sick person is a little like a child. Why have I imagined you to be blonde? The sweetness of your voice, no doubt, and the tender care which you lavished on me made me picture you as fair, or, more probably, my thoughts turned toward an ideal of brightness as toward light itself. The shimmering gold of your hair was like the sun which, escaping my eyes, slipped through my fingers, caressing them with the warm rays of noonday, and the blue of your eyes was a little bit of sky which in the midst of night remained mine." He interrupted himself. "You are crying?"

"It is with joy," demurred Suzanne.

He continued: "This impression is effaced, drowned in my love. It is because I fancied you fair that I loved blonde beauty. You understand, don't you, dear? You know that if you had been dark I should have loved the beauty of brunettes? That the beauty which I really love is your love?"

The anguish of her deceit stabbed Suzanne. She tried to draw away her hands, but Andre held them fast. She slipped to her knees, hiding her face against him as if he could have seen it. She summoned her courage, ready for the supreme denial, resolved to fly afterwards as soon as she found strength to rise, and never to return.

"Must I say it to you? If we have been deceiving each other, Suzanne; if the delicate thought had come to you to indulge my dream of light by allowing me to imagine you blonde; and if I, on my side—"

A sob from Suzanne interrupted him an instant. "He knows, he knows!" she murmured despairingly; but Andre was speaking now in a voice which trembled with passion:

"The senses of the blind are wonderfully subtle. The artless deception of your lips, Suzanne, the faint perfume of bitter almonds in your hair betrayed you in spite of yourself."

Suzanne's denial was arrested on her lips. Oh, what would it have mattered if she were blonde or brunette, had she but been beautiful! But that Andre should find in her, instead of the radiant vision of his dream, only the charm of her voice, the sweetness of her smile! Why had she not gone away before the operation? Why had she waited until now?

"The fingers of the blind, also?" continued Andre, "are wonderful instruments. My fingers, they saw you. You never suspected their cunning caresses, nor the still more delicate perceptions of my lips. Ah, your face! Not with the expressionless features of the virgins in a missal, but animated, mobile. I know it so well that I could draw it from memory."

Suzanne at intervals continued to sob. She felt herself seen indeed, and some force sweet and mysterious seemed to envelop her.

Her name again breathed by Andre like a prayer, made her look up involuntarily and a cry escaped her.

He was gazing at her with eager eyes, and it seemed to her as if a new and unexpected being had emerged from the darkness and mystery.

"Yes," confessed Andre, while she hid her face again dismayed, "yes, we have deceived you, too. I am cured already. I see! And at last I have seen you, my Suzanne, and it is indeed the you whom I have known, so beautiful in the pallor of your anguish, soon more beautiful still in your love and happiness. Oh, Suzanne! Raise your dear face! Look at me—let me discover you, all that is you, at last!"

The Hand of Benjamin

There are more things peculiar to families than traits of character and physical features. Men inherit defects of the mind as well as defects of the body. Sometimes we may find two brothers having precisely the same curious and imperfect method of reasoning. For illustration take the Heney brothers, Francis and Benjamin. With the former, obliquity of mental vision we are all more or less familiar. That it is a family characteristic I learn from a letter which Ben Heney recently wrote to Jim Mellus of Los Angeles a copy of which lies before me. Some time ago Mellus assigned a claim against Heney for $14,000 to W. L. Batiford who sued and recovered judgment. The facts were plain and they were established by letters written by Heney who agreed to purchase certain shares of mining stock. That a contract for the sale of the stock had been made was evidenced by correspondence. Heney repudiated the contract. The trial court held that the contract was valid. Heney appealed and the Court of Appeals of the Los Angeles district affirmed the judgment. Then came this letter from Heney to Mellus:

ONLY BY

Los Angeles, July 10, 1910

James J. Mellus,

California Club, Los Angeles.

So. Your infamous and perjured judgment against me will in due time receive two answers. One is damage suit against you and your counsel for your perjured failure to carry out your agreement between F. J. Schmitt and myself and R. R. Richardson, and which resulted in the loss to me of my son, as well as the loss of $90,000 to Francis J. Heney and myself and the mining properties I held under bond. The other, a final settlement of all our affairs whenever I see you in Los Angeles or elsewhere. As a delinquent of females, but a sinner of more of years, you are deserving of both answers.

(Signed) BEN HENEY.

The tone is decidedly that of Francis, but the hand is the hand of Benjamin. The man in Arizona writes just as the man from Arizona talks. Their manner proclaims them twins. They assert themselves in a large, gruff, and with no sense of relevancy. As you read Ben's letter you will see him, saying the one, looking at the other, his eyes in his forehead standing out like whipsnakes, his eyes blurred and rolling, and you rub your eyes to make sure that you're not looking at brother Francis.

Heney's Folly

As a family exhibit the letter would have looked verisimilitude had it contained no threat to do bodily harm. In setting forth by way of answer to a judgment duly entered and recorded a promise to put an end to Mellus's sublimity of Benjamin was true to form. This bit of logic is absolutely characteristic. In the Heney act of intellectual fencing this is the argument irrefutable. Francis J. recommends it as preferable to any other form of the argumentum ad personam. The only objection to it is that the other fellow might take it seriously and allow a Heney no alternative but to run away. But Benjamin is comparatively safe in Arizona. According to Mellus who has a keen sense of the ridiculous and red blood in his veins it was a foolish letter for Heney to write, for nevermore will he dare to come to Los Angeles. Mellus knows the Heney's very well, and he says that they know him, too, a circumstance that warrants the assumption that the distance between Tucson and Los Angeles is about as close as he will ever be able to approach the raging Ben. He regards the letter as a great joke on Heney, and as such he has been showing it to his friends to make them laugh.

From Lissner's Repertoire

A man may be judged not only by the company he keeps but by the stories he tells. It is by one of his stories that I judge Meyer Lissner, the Los Angeles reformer, who has dictated the Republican policy of this campaign by which President Taft is treated as an undesirable citizen. Mr. Lissner was a guest at the luncheon given recently by some of the merchants and professional men of this city who are in sympathy with the purposes of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. Mr. Lissner told a story on that occasion. Why he told it I do not know. As to the point of it, that is something beyond the range of my perceptive faculties. If it has any moral, I have been unable to apprehend it. When Mr. Lissner told the story he was in full possession of his faculties. No wine had been drunk, nor had anything been said that might have been taken as a cue by the man from Los Angeles for something calculated to divert the assembled minds to topics less prosaic than those under discussion. The Lissner story was one of personal experience. He related that one evening shortly after his arrival, in company with the sedate and ascetic candidate for Lieutenant-Governor, Mr. Wallace, he wandered into the tenderloin and at a public resort he met a woman with a high complexion whom he engaged in conversation. She told him she did not like the career she was pursuing. He told her to come to Republican headquarters and he would give her a job. She did so, and she was sent out to canvass a south-side district for the purpose of getting figures on the gubernatorial fight. She returned shortly in disgust, having met a stout housewife who, when asked what party her husband belonged to made reply in a surly tone, "He belongs to my party." The lady from the tenderloin didn't care to visit any more homes. "So," said Mr. Lissner, with a broad grin, "I turned her over to Wallace. He'll take care of her." This is the type of humor that has brought the present campaign to its present level.

The Spreckels Science

All of us have known from childhood, having taken the poet's word for it, that distance lends enchantment to the view, but it is only since the fire that we have come to find out that at a distance objects are seen as through a convex lens, and that on the retina of the mind's eye they increase in proportion as they fade from view. The discovery of this remarkable phenomenon was made in the great civic laboratory founded and supported by that illustrious philanthropist the Hon. Rudolph Spreckels. The discovery was first brought to public attention when Mr. Spreckels for the furtherance of his most beneficent enterprise began soliciting through his agents foreign impressions of local celebrities. It will be remembered that at brief intervals during the graft prosecution we were informed by letter and telegram of the rare worth of men who were very eager to employ public confidence as a fulcrum for their weighty designs. Certificates of character poured in on us from the farthest-flung boundaries of the country, and we were advised of the high esteem in which we ought to hold certain men about whom we had some suspicion. These certificates came in the form of private communications. There was nothing in them to indicate that they were intended for public consumption, or that they had been evoked for a purpose. Ostensibly they were dictated by nothing but profound concern for the general welfare. And naturally among men who think occasionally, and who knew nothing of the scientific principle discovered under Mr. Spreckels's patronage, these strange certificates provoked astonishment. Also they excited mirth and derision. For only by the cognoscenti was it understood how a man in New York was able to analyze the character of a man in San Francisco whom he had never seen and concerning whom presumably he knew nothing beyond what he had read in the newspapers.

Absent Reading

Of late we have been again witnessing experiments in the new science. For campaign purposes the members of Mr. Spreckels's Mutual Admiration Society are as busy as bird dogs at the opening of the season. And now we learn that Hiram Johnson, Mr. Kent and Judge Lawlor viewed at a distance of several thousand miles loom up as gigantic beings, idealized and magnified as were the actors in the Greek drama in the days of Pericles. First comes a telegram from the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt to the Hon. Curtiss Lindley the burden of which is the traditional sing-song of encomium: Mr. Johnson is the most upright of men, a champion of the people's rights, a righteous patriot, a redeemer, a new David divinely commissioned to destroy the Goliath of corruption, etc., etc., etc. This is the testimony of the same T. R. who formerly vouched for the honor and integrity of Francis J. Heney, which testimony was rejected by an incorrigible, benighted community whose skepticism was expressed by a majority vote of ten thousand. But T. R. is not discouraged; neither is Mr. Lindley, nor is Mr. Spreckels. T. R. has never met Mr. Johnson. But he has inspected him from afar. At a distance of some thousands of miles the Johnson nimbus casts a blinding glare on the mental optic of the new Agamemnon before whom great men were not. Through the dark forward and abysm of the vast spaces of the continent T. R. reads the character of our gubernatorial candidate and assures Mr. Lindley that it is flawless. And Mr. Lindley gives the glad news to the world that there may be no misapprehension in the minds of men who have met Mr. Johnson and seen him eat. One of the valuable results of the application of this new scientific principle is that it has served to throw a flood of light on Mr. Roosevelt himself. The mind of that man must indeed be docile who has reaped no instruction from the action of the ex-President of the United States in bestowing his endorsement on a man he has never met, whose past he does not know, whose instincts and out-stinks have always been as far beyond the range of his perceptive faculties as the mysterious markings on Mars.

Wheeler on Lawlor

Among the testimonials that have come by wire from long-distance observers is one from a comparatively obscure individual in New York by the name of Wheeler, who vouches for the Hon. William P. Lawlor, Spreckels's candidate for the Supreme Court. Mr. Wheeler, it appears, takes Judge Lawlor's candidacy seriously. Somebody having told him that Judge Lawlor has really and truly staked out the Supreme Court as the goal of his ambition, he set himself to the task of a transcontinental reading of the little judge's mind and heart. Of course you and I know that whatever may be attributed to The Family Club's Sancho Panza he is a practical man free from hallucinations, with no ridiculous obsessions or crotchets. You and I know that he is running for the job merely to keep himself before the darling public, and that he would much rather be trying Minnie Adams or Abe Ruef with the limelight blazing on his imperial brow. But Mr. Wheeler doesn't know, and hence the superfluous and futile eulogium in illustration of the new scientific principle.

Lawlor at Close Range

Thanks to Mr. Wheeler, however, our crass ignorance is dispelled. He tells us that Judge Lawlor is really a great jurist, upright, strong of character, versed in the mysteries of the law and qualified to sit in judgment on anybody or anything. How different is this picture from any one of the series that Budd Fisher gave us in the heyday of Mutt and Little Jeff! Fisher gave us the impression that Judge Lawlor was merely a man with an appetite for olives and some curious principles of conduct to be found neither in the Decalogue nor the civil code. If we are to believe Wheeler the Fisher cartoons were libelous. And if we are to believe Wheeler then the members of the bar are very poor judges of judicial material. According to the members of the bar Judge Lawlor is a joke on the bench. The members of the Los Angeles bar, four hundred and fifty strong, were asked to give him their endorsement the other day, and they gave him thirty votes. But perhaps there are only thirty lawyers in Los Angeles that know anything about the science of reading character at a distance. Perhaps the other four hundred and twenty have been influenced by reports from the San Francisco bar. For San Francisco lawyers are prejudiced against Judge Lawlor on general principles. They know that for ten years before Governor Budd (for good-fellowship) appointed Judge Lawlor to the bench, he was only, so to speak, a hanger-on of the profession, and got admitted to practice on a pull just in time to qualify for the job. These being the facts the profession frowns at the manner of Judge Lawlor's conception. The lawyers discuss him in tones of derision, as though he were a Shallow, a Dogberry or a Bunsby, and they are fond of keeping alive tradition pertaining to his evolution. For example, they are never tired of repeating Sammy Brauhart's famous mot. Speaking of Judge Lawlor one day Sammy satirically observed: "The presumption ought to be that Judge Lawlor is a great lawyer, for he never lost a case." Which of course is quite true as Judge Lawlor never had a client. And yet Judge Lawlor may be the man that Mr. Wheeler describes. Who knows but that he was born for the bench with a head crammed full of all the law that was ever written?

Two Straw Ballots

I met the other night a well-known member of the State Legislature who has long been identified with the Republican organization, and asked him what he thought about the probable outcome of the gubernatorial fight. He answered without hesitation that he thought Bell would win and instanced two straw polls in support of his belief. The first was taken a few nights ago in San Rafael which is normally Republican by a big majority. In a crowd which was listening to a band concert 97 men were polled and of these 59 were for Bell and 38 for Johnson. The second was taken in the French Club. Dining together were fourteen gentlemen, twelve of whom were Republicans while the other two were not citizens. All the twelve voters declared that they intended to vote for Bell. Are these straws that show how the wind is blowing?

A Benevolent Colonel

One of the good planks in the Republican platform is that which declares in favor of high wages. And as I am in favor of always giving the devil his due I hope that the authorship of this plank will be attributed to Colonel Harris Weinstock, who was chairman of the platform committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League convention. Colonel Weinstock has the interests of the wage-earner at heart; so much so that he has consecrated his talents to the task of solving the great perennial problem involving the rights of downtrodden labor and the duties of arrogant capital. Colonel Weinstock is himself an employer of labor. He is of the firm of Weinstock, Lubin & Co., which employs many saleswomen, some of whom get as high as $7 a week. Indeed the average wage of saleswomen in his store is $10 a week, a princely sum in these days when luxuries are accessible to all women and the cost of living is a bagatelle. I doubt not that Colonel Weinstock is in favor of organizing a union for saleswomen so that all his competitors shall be required to emulate his munificence. The Colonel, I believe, is looking forward anxiously to election day, as he knows that in the event of Hiram Johnson's election he will be close to the throne and able consequently to do much good for the plain people. Hiram used to be the Colonel's attorney in and about Sacramento in the old days. I believe he handled a great deal of important business for the Colonel all the way from Sacramento to Placerville.

The Colonel Interrupted

Over at the Washington Square Theater in the Latin Quarter a very capable company has been presenting Shakespearean dramas in Italian and a great many people who do not understand the language have attended and enjoyed the performances. One night last week "Hamlet" was given to a crowded house. Those who saw it tell me that the tragedy was splendidly presented, the Italian actor who played the part of the melancholy prince being particularly good. When he was delivering the great soliloquy the audience complimented his ability by preserving a deathlike stillness. But in the midst of the soliloquy when he had reached the words, "To sleep; perchance to dream," and everybody was hanging breathlessly on his words, a tremendous snore came from one of the boxes. "That's Colonel Kowalsky, as sure as I live," said Charlie Asher to a companion. And on investigation they discovered the friend of the late King Leopold slumbering comfortably in his coign of vantage. I suppose the mention of sleep acted on the colonel like the wave of a hypnotist's hand on a "subject." He just couldn't make his nose behave.

Bierce and London Reconciled

Why has nobody called attention to the fact that Ambrose Bierce and Jack London have become reconciled? Time was, as all our literary people will recall, when Bierce burst into a torrent of objurgatory adjectives whenever London's name was mentioned in his hearing and on his part Jack London was no whit less uncomplimentary toward the name and fame of Ambrose Bierce. But time heals many wounds besides having a mellowing influence on the worst of us. Ambrose Bierce attended the midsummer jinks of the Bohemian Club as the guest of George Sterling. Jack London was also there and knowing the old hostility Sterling was busy most of the time keeping the twain apart. Finally when the task was getting on his nerves Sterling went to Bierce and frankly asked him to avoid London so that nothing unpleasant might disturb the tranquility of the grove. Bierce could not take that view of the matter. "Why should I avoid London?" he demanded. "In my present mood of amiability I have none but the kindest feeling for him. Why, I could even be civil to William Greer Harrison if I happened to meet him." The last statement was conclusive, so Sterling went after London and the three literateurs held a love feast whereat much wine of wizardry was spilled in libation to the god of friendship.

How the Call Missed a Scoop

If the ordinary newspaperman dared to chaff a managing editor Ernest Simpson, the managing editor of the Call, would come in for a lot of chaffing these days. For Simpson almost bumped into the Examiner's big scoop on the graft in San Mateo County. The night before the Examiner sprang its exclusive story Simpson was going home when at the corner of Castro and Duboce avenue he noticed through the thick fog the figure of a man who was acting suspiciously. It is a lonely neighborhood, not unknown to footpads, and Simpson took a firm grip on the revolver in his coat pocket as he approached. The man seemed to be waiting for him and as he came nearer, asked: "Is that you, Cobby?" The voice in the fog did not sound menacing but Simpson was taking no chances and with a curt, "No, it's not," he went on. And that's where he made his mistake, for the man hovering in the fog was Jesse Marks and he was waiting for Edmond Coblenz of the Examiner in order to give him a statement of his connection with the bribery scandal. Marks lives near the corner of Castro and Duboce and had been induced to wait for the Examiner reporter on the sidewalk instead of within his home because it was deemed best to get him away from the influence of his family. If Simpson had stopped he would have recognized Marks and in all probability would have obtained the story. But instead he went home and to bed, blissfully unconscious that the Examiner was "putting one over."

Judge Coffey's Slip

For years Judge Coffey has prided himself on his orthographical correctness and many a lawyer has learned to his cost that slovenly spelling doesn't go in department nine. Even the most difficult proper names must be spelled correctly in the papers submitted to Judge Coffey or those papers will not receive his signature. Knowing this characteristic of the judge the lawyers are having a quiet laugh on him this week. For the first time (I think) in his political career Judge Coffey has put out election cards and on those cards the word "appellate" is misspelled by the omission of an l. Just watch one lawyer hand one of those cards to another and if they don't chortle their heads off I miss my guess.

Mr. Bentley's Answer

The California Fruit Cannery's Association was indicted the other day for violating the Pure Food law, and Charles H. Bentley, manager of the corporation, promptly took occasion to utter himself in extenuation and mitigation. Whatever Mr. Bentley says ought to go a long way. For Mr. Bentley is one of our conspicuously upright citizens. He is among our most active civic patriots, so zealous in the cause of reform that he puts up his good money to send men to jail for technical violations of the law. Therefore it is to be assumed that if the California Fruit Cannery's Association is not innocent of intentional wrongdoing at any rate Mr. Bentley is not justly to be held responsible for either its sins of omission or commission. And I for one am in favor of doing even more than suspending judgment in the case of his corporation. But at the same time, merely in an academic spirit, I will say a few words in criticism of Mr. Bentley's answer to Uncle Sam's troublesome indictments. The answer in my judgment is somewhat weak. "We put up about 60,000,000 packages a year," says Mr. Bentley, "and during all the years we have been in business we have never heard of a case of illness or poisoning arising from the use of our products." Now manifestly this testimony is not conclusive of the purity of Mr. Bentley's goods. A man might get sick on Mr. Bentley's jam without calling in a doctor or reporting the matter to the authorities. He might take a home remedy, swear off on jam and there let the whole subject matter rest. Again it is among the probabilities that men have been poisoned with jam and blamed it on the oysters or the ice cream. So, I say, Mr. Bentley's testimony is not conclusive. It raises a presumption but it doesn't quash the indictment.

The Moldy Berry

Again: Mr. Bentley says, "The indictment does not charge that we placed any chemical adulterants in our products for the purpose of coloring or preserving them." Now the Examiner quoting the words of an indictment says that it sets forth that some of Bentley's jam was made up of "adulterated and decomposed vegetable" substance. If this be true Mr. Bentley's statement savors somewhat of equivocation. The charge, says Mr. Bentley, "rests on the fact that the chemist found cells of mold and yeast in the jams, jellies and catsup." And he adds, "There is no practical way in which the presence of these cells can be avoided. We exercise the greatest care in the quality of berries used and where there is a large lot of fermented berries we throw them out; but in picking and assorting berries it is impossible that an occasional fermented berry should not get into the product." If there is no practical way of avoiding the presence of moldy cells then of course Mr. Bentley's company cannot be expected to do the impossible. And doubtless he speaks the truth, for Uncle Sam found as many as fifteen cases of Mr. Bentley's strawberry jam in one day, containing decomposed vegetable matter. Which goes to show that the occasional moldy berry is somewhat of a repeater. Seemingly another objection to Mr. Bentley's answer is that it is not complete. He confines himself to jams and jellies, whereas Uncle Sam has reached out and embraced tomato catsup, "composed of bad vegetables," says the Examiner. Perhaps the bad vegetables are also unavoidable. Indeed Mr. Bentley tells us that if required to comply with the law he'd have to abandon one branch of his business. Strong is my faith in Mr. Bentley, but I'd like to hear from Cross & Blackwell as to the persistency of the moldy berry.

To Whom Honor is Due

There is nothing in which the people of this city are more vitally interested than the public schools. It is of the highest importance that the schools should be under honest and efficient management, and that for their welfare there should be unremitting vigilance and enthusiasm. I believe it is generally understood that in recent years the schools have been under exceptionally good management, and that Superintendent Alfred Roncovieri has made a record the excellence of which commends him to a majority of the voters, but it is to be hoped that he will receive a majority sufficiently large to serve as a signal tribute to him for his devotion to public duty.

The Status of the Roosevelts

It will be extremely interesting to sit back and watch the social progress of the young Teddy Roosevelts in this city. This estimable couple, it will be recalled, were overlooked by the Will Crockers when invitations were issued for Miss Ethel Crocker's coming-out party at New Place. Of course those who are familiar with the ins and outs of the factional differences caused by the graft prosecution can easily account for that. But the Roosevelts are made welcome in the affairs presided over by Miss Jennie Crocker and her brother Templeton. When Miss Crocker and her brother returned from the East the other day Mrs. Henry Addison Alexander, the mother of young Mrs. Teddy Roosevelt, accompanied them and she is now visiting Burlingame as the guest of Mrs. Easton and Miss Crocker. Are we to suppose that Miss Jennie Crocker will omit her cousin Miss Ethel Crocker from the entertainments which will be arranged in honor of Mrs. Alexander? Or will Mrs. Alexander with her daughter and son-in-law meet Miss Ethel Crocker and her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Will Crocker, on amicable terms? That is something which is still to be determined.

Society and Its Skates

Incidents that cannot be avoided in the best regulated social circles have sometimes made me pause and ask myself, Is our society really metropolitan? The horrid suspicion that we have yet some traces of the poison of provincialism to eliminate from our social system will obtrude itself on a speculative mind, but I am happy in the consciousness that I have always been able to argue it away. If I were in any doubt at the present moment as to the metropolitan complexion of our exclusive corral it would be banished by one simple announcement—Mrs. Buck is about to revive her skating club. A society which boasts a skating club can never be open to the charge of provincialism, for skating is one of the pastimes in which only the socially elect know how to excel. Can you imagine a smart skating club in Kokomo or Los Angeles? Perish the thought! It is only in places of genuine high tone that the skate is the recipient of social recognition. In San Francisco the skate is beloved of our smartest men and women; it is cultivated, enjoyed, talked about. It is anticipated lovingly before it comes and longingly remembered when it has gone. I am speaking, it need not be said, of the roller skate. Mrs. Buck tells me that the following are the dates for the meeting of her club: November 29, December 13 and 27, January 10 and 24 and February 7. On these occasions society will strap on its skates at half after eight and dust the graphite from its clothes at eleven o'clock.

When Will We Have Our Salon?

It begins to look as though Mrs. Francis Carolan does not intend to return to California for the season which will soon be in full swing. Mrs. Carolan is in Paris where Miss Harriet Alexander is her guest and where Mrs. Alexander will soon join her for a stay, it is said, of several months. It really seems that we are not to have Mrs. Carolan's assistance in making the winter season a distinguished one. That is too bad and will cause mourning in the set which looks to Mrs. Carolan for light and guiding. But to me Mrs. Carolan's absence has a more sorrowful significance. It means that we must wait indefinitely for the establishment of that salon wherein Mrs. Carolan is to revivify the intellectual tendencies of Mesdames Recamier, de Stael, Vigee Le Brun and the rest of those brilliant Frenchwomen. Dancing parties and teas are all very well, but what we really need in San Francisco society is a salon which will sharpen wits and snuff the sputtering flame of culture. Mrs. Carolan promised to give us this, but she did not specify the time and I suppose we must wait patiently until she sees fit to come home and get busy.

Our Gorgeous Debutantes

Judging by what society has witnessed thus far this season bids fair to out-rival all others in the dressing of its debutantes. Several of them, notably Miss Dora Winn, the Misses Cora and Fredericka Otis and Miss Gertrude Thomas have recently returned from lengthy trips abroad, bringing gowns which are marvels of the modiste's skill. Never in the history of local debutantes have such gorgeous frocks been in evidence. Older matrons and belles of several winters have dressed in expensive gowns, but debutantes in hand embroidered chiffons and satins of rare texture never. I heard a staid matron remark the other night that at the close of this season many families would be bankrupt if their daughters tried to keep pace with their more fortunate girl friends who are blessed with this world's goods.

A Slandered Monarch

The ordinary person entertains the idea that the recently deposed King Manuel of Portugal is a licentious and extravagant youth who got what he deserved when he lost his throne. This notion of the young monarch has been industriously circulated by the republican propagandists of Portugal and has received what looked like verification from some of the newspapers of Europe. The fact is, however, that the derogatory stories told about King Manuel are either fabrications or gross exaggerations of ordinary incidents. It was natural that, once they obtained currency, they should be widely published in Portugal for the purpose of inflaming public opinion against the monarchy, but it may puzzle some to account for their origin. There is the story, for instance, that King Manuel kissed a chorus girl before a theater full of people in Marseilles. Or the story that he had made morganatic marriage with a Parisian dancer. Or that he was madly infatuated with a singer in a Paris cafe. Where there is smoke there is bound to be fire, and of course there is a modicum of truth in these and other tales, but the truth deprives them of their scandalous character.

The Unscrupulous Press Agent

The fact is that King Manuel has been the victim of the unscrupulous theatrical press agent whose "stories" have been taken with unusual seriousness, no doubt because they concerned a king. The press agent said that the king had kissed a chorus girl in public, but as a matter of fact the king had merely shaken her hand after she had invaded his box to pin a flower to his coat. The Parisian who was the heroine of the organatic marriage story is old enough to be King Manuel's mother and has a daughter older than he is by her third husband who is still living. Instead of being infatuated with a Paris cafe singer the king merely sent her a gold hatpin and never even spoke to her. As a matter of cold-blooded business there is no form of advertising more valuable to a stage beauty than that which comes from some sort of a connection with royalty and the shrewd press agents and their sometimes shrewder principals have been working King Manuel for all he was worth. The result is that he is widely known as a rake and spendthrift, although those who know him declare that he is a very well behaved young man. His reputation has been butchered to make a press agent holiday.

His English Inamorata

Those who read the interviews which were supposed to come from Gaby des Lys, the French dancer, wherein she chattered about the secrets of her boudoir, must have thought one of two things; either that the interviews were fakes or that Gaby was a shameless woman who did not hesitate to lie for the sake of advertising herself. To what extent she enjoyed the royal favor I have no means of knowing and I have no intention of sifting the gossip of the press to find out. But another story of the same sort has just been called to my attention by a correspondent who was in London when the Portuguese monarchy fell. He sends me the photograph of Miss Lily Elsie who is singing the leading role in the London production of "The Dollar Princess." He refers to her as King Manuel's "chum" and says that it is whispered in London that she is soon to take a vacation to await "a very interesting event." This may be true, and then again it may be false. Miss Elsie may have been the king's "chum" or she may only have received a gold hatpin from him. But the story is a piquant bit of scandal and is sure to have a long life. It illustrates the manner in which Manuel's reputation has been tampered with; that is why I repeat it here.

Lucy Banning's Latest Escapade

So Lucy Banning is at it again! It is quite evident that age cannot wither or custom stale the infinite variety of her passionate attachments. Many there were who thought that when she exhausted the ebullience of youth she would settle down to that discreet behavior that is supposed to comport with matronly dignity, but these have learned that they did not understand Lucy. In her there is neither discretion nor conventionality, and her flirtatious disposition blooms as freshly today as when she first burst upon the notice of southern California as one of the handsomest girls in the State. Her latest adventure with young "Bob" Ross, the son of Judge Erskine Ross of the United States Circuit Court, proves that she still yearns for the excitement that comes from shattering the commandments in the shocked face of Dame Grundy. As for young Ross, he has shown himself a fool and it is no wonder that his father is out of patience with him. The youngster has good stuff in him, but he evidently lacks a balance wheel. Not long since he made a tour of the world and wrote a series of travel letters for a Los Angeles weekly which were interesting and well done. Then he developed the ambition to be a newspaperman. And now he is supporting Lucy Banning who is appearing in her star part of the handsome eloper.

Her Previous History

This simply adds another chapter to the story of Lucy Banning's purple escapades. Even when she was the bride of millionaire Jack Bradbury she was noted for her harum-scarum ways, but most people thought the couple were happy. Then Captain Russell Ward, an Englishman of dashing demeanor, with a wife and children at home, appeared on the scene, and she eloped with him to this city. They were intercepted here and Captain Ward was arrested for adultery. The affair was a nine days' scandal, the papers putting on their most pharisaical airs and denouncing Ward for breaking up the Bradbury home. All his friends deserted him with the exception of Downey Harvey who, to his credit be it re-

Of course there was no conviction but Ward started East a disgraced man and killed himself by hurling himself out of a window of the train. Meanwhile Jack Bradbury took his errant wife back, and they went for a long sojourn in Mexico where Mrs. Bradbury astonished the natives by wearing wonderful wigs of various colors. After a while discord appeared in the Bradbury menage and the temperamental Lucy went home to mother who had all sorts of money whereas the Bradbury fortune, it was said, had been seriously depleted. A divorce followed and not much was heard of Lucy till she married Mace Greenleaf, the actor. Now, I presume, there will be another divorce.

The End of a Craze

Writing from Paris a traveling friend has this to say: "Chantecler has ended its run here this week. Of course the book is a magnificent literary work, but the play is impossible. Human beings make absurd animals. As a fad Chantecler is dead. Chantecler novelties are never seen in the shops these days, or Chantecler hats on the streets. As a play and as a fad Chantecler has blown up in Paris, but I suppose the Maude Adams production in New York will give it a new lease of life in America."

The United Daughters of the Confederacy, Albert Sidney Johnstone Chapter, will give a vaudeville tea this afternoon at the St. Francis. There will be a fine musical program and all sorts of attractions to remind guests of the sunny south.

Considerable interest is being taken in the forthcoming book, "A Nation's Crime," written by Mrs. I. Lowenberg, the author of "The Irresistible Current." Mrs. Lowenberg is prominent in many of the leading women's clubs of the city. Her work in connection with the Prison Commission is well known and there is no doubt that the forthcoming book will make a stir.

The wedding of Miss Margaret Helen Wood and Mr. Marcy Woods took place at the home of the bride's family on October 25. The groom is part owner of the well known "Woods Brothers Ranch" on Roberts Island while the bride belongs to a well known and wealthy family of St.

Comedy at the Columbia

By Theodore Bonnet

The Columbia Theater program tells us that "The Fortune Hunter" is "a new American comedy." This is precisely what it is. Furthermore it is peculiarly American in type, being a kind of nonsense and common sense. A fine kind it is, too, rich in absurdity and drollery with a sprinkling of horse-play of the kind that has done service in many a farce and circus and that always compels the guffaws of the groundlings. What would an American comedy be without something to appeal to our instinct for practical joking? The practical joke is distinctly an American institution. Men with talent for practical joking, with genius for cover-is not a comedy that gives us an opportunity to laugh at our own foibles and vanities. It only affords us opportunity to shriek at the blunders of others, simple folk with whom we have nothing in common, so odd that to us they are farcical. Hence it is essentially American, as easy to laugh at as at a man slipping on a banana peel. To enjoy the other kind of comedy, the subtle kind, the kind which presupposes that every man carries in himself the key to other men's experience, and can view his own weaknesses philosophically, one must have that most uncommon of gifts, the gift of common sense. This kind of comedy that enables us to see ourselves as other see us, to laugh at ourselves and become ashamed of our own defects, is the greatest of moral agencies. There is an abundance of material for this higher type of comedy on all sides of us, but our dramatists have yet to seize upon it. Perhaps they are waiting for us to be educated out of our self-complacency. But meanwhile let us not be lacking in appreciation of a playwright who can turn out such a good piece of work as "The Fortune Hunter." Winchell Smith has the talent and the imagination to handle effectively themes of more universal interest than the one with which he is convulsing audiences at the Columbia this week. He has given us an ingenious plot, he has brought on the stage characters that are more than mere abstractions; he has shown dexterity of construction, refinement of joinery and lightness of touch. His development of the character of the sweet-tempered old inventor, admirably played by Frank Bacon, the one artist in the cast, is masterly; his manipulation of his comic types is skilful, and beneath all the nonsense of the play his psychology is sound. The play has met with great success, but it will soon vanish into lasting desuetude. Mr. Smith should abandon the over-worked rural village with its eccentric types of character that so easily lend themselves to portrayal, and try his hand at delineating life as it presents itself in the great pageant that moves through our bustling cities. Dramatists have no reason to complain of limitation of subject in this country. There is as much material here as there was in France in the days of Moliere, as there was in Greece in the days of Aristophanes.

g their fellow mortals with humiliation, achieve great popularity in our clubs. It is because we have to see a man sit on his hat that the slapstick is really the symbol of the comedic spirit in this enlightened country. In "The Fortune Hunter" there is no slap-stick, but there is a soda-fountain, and the hero accidentally sprays two girls with soda. Instantly the ludicrousness of the situation takes hold of the imagination of the audience and clings to it with all its ramifications. But even aside from the soda-fountain incident the play is good American comedy. It is written in the Ade vein, without having either as much nonsense or as much common sense as may be found in some of the Ade comedies. For the present it will serve very well to draw us out of our natural gloom and banish leaden-eyed melancholy from our midst. For after all what the American public want is merely to proclaim a truce with reason and be pleased with as little expense of thought and pretense to wisdom as possible. And this being so "The Fortune Hunter" is eminently grateful. It is American comedy of the most amiable quality, dealing with life in a rural village, giving us a Hogarthian transcript of manners alien to the madding crowd, the absurdity and singularity of which glide over the mind and evaporate in levity. The Garrick Girls

By Edward F. O'Day

When dramatic criticism deals with musical comedy it is bound to be anatomical. Voices are all very well in their way and the ability to act is not to be despised, but faces and figures are the sine qua non of this delicious form of entertainment. The homely girl may become a Bernhardt or an Ellen Terry but she can never shine in musical comedy. Neither can the girl who is knock-kneed or splay-footed. A musical comedy girl may be thin or she may be fat, she may be tall or short—it is immaterial, so long as she has an attractive face and a figure built on approved lines of human architecture. With these truisms in mind I cast a coldly critical eye over the Garrick girls a few nights ago. (The eye, be it understood, should always be coldly critical when it surveys stage beauties.) It did not take me long to formulate a judgment of the Garrick girls, but first impressions are apt to be deceptive and in the matter of feminine faces and feminine figures it is humiliating to be deceived. So I set aside my first judgment and looked again. The first judgment seemed to be justified. Still skeptical and with the fervor of a scientist determined to solve a weighty problem I resurveyed the entire collection and although I must confess that my eye was not nearly as coldly critical as at first, I was forced to the conclusion that the Garrick girls were a handsome and shapely aggregation of womanhood. "Forced" is not the right word. Perhaps I should say that I embraced the conclusion with warm enthusiasm. And the enthusiasm was not misplaced. One might go a long way from Ellis street before finding a crowd of girls worthier of praise for their faces and their figures than the girls of Max Dill's company. They must have been picked out by connoisseurs. The principals, I suppose, were selected by Max Dill himself and they are a credit to his taste. The chorus girls, no doubt, were picked out by Frank Stammers, the stage director, and they prove that his eye for pulchritude is as sure as his eye for scenic effects. It would be hard to say which is the more inspiring—a stageful of pretty faces or a stageful of shapely legs. When we are treated to a stageful of both, as at the Garrick, inspiration is apt to become rhapsodic—and I heard several men rhapsodizing in the lobby between acts. And well they might, whether about the principals or the chorus. Miss Lora Lieb, for instance, received a bouquet of encomiastic adjectives. She is divinely tall and most divinely svelte and she is fair after a dashing, brilliant fashion that captivates quickly and irresistibly. In a number like "That's Why the Danube is Blue" her face mirrors many moods in rapid transition and every mood is fetching. Of Lora Lieb's gowns and hats I can only say that they seem to represent the latest word of the fashion moulded artistically to a charming personality and I defy Lady Duff Gordon to say that her sister Vera, which is saying a great deal, just as graceful, which is no small tribute. Lora Vera she possesses that sultriness of beauty which lends itself admirably to the purposes of musical comedy. Of Edith Whitely it is only necessary to remark, with apologies to the poet, "On life, that Max Dill has a mighty pretty wife." The girls of the chorus measure up to the high standard of face and figure set by these principals. They are good to look upon. It is on record is Boswell's book that Dr. Johnson was a good deal disturbed by the "silk stockings and the white bosoms" of the women he met in Dr. Garrick's green room. It is well for his peace of mind that he didn't live to see the Garrick girls.

Stage

Russian Dancers from the Metropolitan

Although we will not hear the song-birds of Gatti-Cazzaza this season, we are soon to witness the crowning success of the Metropolitan Opera of New York. Manager Will. L. Greenbaum is bringing the Imperial Russian Ballet, headed by Mlle. Anna Pavlova and Mikail Mordkin, and ten solo danseurs and danseuses, a complete corps de ballet, all augmented by the orchestra from the Metropolitan Opera House under the direction of Herr Theodore Steier, conductor of the famous Bechstein Hall Symphony orchestra of London. This mammoth organization which has been the sensation of the times throughout the country, is unquestionably the most pretentious enterprise on tour and is equipped with all the original scenic and property effects and the wonderful electrical appliances which were brought from Moscow and St. Petersburg for the New York engagement. In addition the properties constructed in New York by James Fox, admittedly America's foremost scenic artist and constructor, are all carried on the special train. The Russian ballet is under the direct patronage of the Czar of Russia in whose realm the dance is purely a government institution and has flourished as a part of opera house offerings for many years. In America this form of dance or, as it has been termed, "ocular opera," is practically a new form of divertissement, but the hold that the mute eloquence of Pavlova and Mordkin and their confreres has taken on New York, Chicago and Boston, augurs well for the permanency of the dance in this country. On this tour the dancers are presenting two complete ballets. The first, "Giselle," is in two acts and was written by Theophile Gautier from the theme of a tale by Heinrich Heine, with music by Adolphe Adam. The second, "Arabian Nights," is an arrangement by Mons. Mordkin based on the legendary tales, interpreted with music from the works of Rimsky-Korsakow, Glazounow, Bourgaull-Decondray, Rubenstein, Chaminade and others. In addition to the ballets, the stars and their assistants offer dances of a Russian national character, interpretative works of Tschaikowski, Saint-Saens, Chopin, Liszt, Glinka, Delibes, Arensky and others. In the execution of their numbers Pavlova and Mordkin are especially assisted by the first solo danseuse,

EDWIN SCHNEIDER
Pianist-composer with Mlle. Gadski.

Mlle. Bronislawa Pajitzkaia. During their forthcoming engagement they will give their famous "Bachannele," and Mordkin's wonderful "Arrow Dance" which was their foremost sensation in the European capitals as well as in New York. Taken as a whole an entertainment of this kind and character has never before toured through the west. Another feature of the attractions is the great effort used to bring them from their native land in the first place. It was through tremendous influence that the Czar was finally induced to give his consent. There was an enormous bounty and guarantee deposited for their safe return to St. Petersburg and nothing short of the millions of capitalization of the Metropolitan could have brought them out of Russia. Manager Greenbaum has secured the Valencia Theater for the week of November 21, the date of their local appearances, and will give matinees on Thursday (Thanksgiving), Saturday and Sunday, and has further succeeded in holding down prices of admission identical with the New York and Chicago scales, notwithstanding the increased expense of the long tour and the smaller capacity of the local playhouse. Lower floor seats will be $3.00. The balcony is to be divided into $3.00, $2.00 and $1.00 seats, with box seats placed at $4.00. The sale opens Monday morning, November 14, at Sherman, Clay & Co's and is usual with Greenbaum attractions mail orders, closing check or money order will be given careful attention.

Blanche Walsh Coming

"The Fortune Hunter" will be given for the other week, beginning this Sunday night. Following "The Fortune Hunter" at the Columbia the attraction will be Blanche Walsh and a strong supporting company in the new play by Frederic Arnold Kummer, entitled "The Other Woman." It is said to be a play of great merit. Miss Walsh plays the part of a woman who loves another's husband and who is loved in return. This "Other Woman," however, refuses to be the cause of husband and wife separating, and the resulting struggle with herself is a bitter one.

Nazimova in Three Plays at the Savoy

The last performance of "The City" will take place at the Savoy this Sunday evening and on Monday night that distinguished Russian actress, the Nazimova who created such a profound impression on the occasion of her first appearance here last year, will begin an engagement limited to six nights and three matinees. On Monday

On Wednesday and Thursday evenings and at the usual Thursday matinee she will appear as Nora in "A Doll's House," and on Friday and Saturday evenings and at the Saturday matinee she will offer, for the first time here, "The Fairy Tale," a new play by Arthur Schnitzler.

The Gadski Concerts

Mme. Johanna Gadski will open her series of three concerts in this city with a matinee this Sunday afternoon, November 6, at the Columbia, assisted by Edwin Schneider, the American composer and pianist. As usual the Gadski programs are superlative both from an educational and entertainment standpoint. The second concert will be given Thursday night, November 10, at the Novelty, this being the only evening concert of the engagement. The farewell concert is scheduled for Sunday afternoon, November 13, at the Columbia, with an entirely different program.

Russian Dancers at the Orpheum

The Imperial Russian Dancers, Alexander Linene, Lydia Lapokawa and Theodor Lapokawa who have been the rage of all the European capitals and who are in this country by permission of the Czar will appear in a series of characteristic and classical dances at the Orpheum next week. Mlle. Camille Ober, the Russian star who has been brought to this country expressly to play the Orpheum Circuit, will make her first appearance. She is considered a phenomenal vocalist. The New York Trio will singcoon songs in amusing fashion to the accompaniment of the mandolin, guitar and viol. All three are said to have pleasing voices and personalities that attract. Miss Felice Morris, daughter of the late Felix Morris, one of America's most distinguished character actors, will appear in Edgar Allan Woolf's comedietta, "A Call for Help." Next week concludes the engagements of The Old Soldier Fiddlers, Frank Morrell, The Gus Onlaw Trio and Lionel Barrymore and McKee Rankin.

The Liza Lehmann Concerts

The first Liza Lehmann concert will be given Tuesday night, November 15, and will be for members of the Pacific Musical Society. No seats will be sold to the public for this event. The second will be given Thursday night at the Novelty when the beautiful setting of the quatrains from "The Rubaiyat" called "In a Persian Garden" and "The Nonsense Songs" from "Alice in Wonderland" will be given in their entirety. The farewell concert will be given Sunday afternoon, November 20, at the Columbia, when "The Breton Folk Songs," "The Cautionary Tales," selections from "The Golden Threshold" and numerous solo numbers will be given.

The Charity Matinee Postponed

Telegrams having been received from Blanche Walsh and William Faversham expressing a desire to take part in the coming Charity Fund Benefit to be given under the auspices of the Associated Theatrical Managers of San Francisco, it has been decided to postpone that affair for one week, the date finally settled upon being Friday afternoon, November 18, at two o'clock. Miss Walsh will undoubtedly present something very interesting, Mr. Faversham and Miss Julie Opp will appear in a sketch, Max Dill, Lora Lieb, Beatriz Michelena-Middleton and others from the Garrick Theater will offer the musical comedy portion of the entertainment, "The Blue Mouse," which will then be playing at the Princess, will contribute something interesting, the Orpheum promises the Russian dancers and other high-class acts, and Bessie Barriscale, Howard Hickman and others from the Alcazar will present "Disqualified," a one-act playlet.

"Too Much Johnson." at the Alcazar

William Gillette's laugh-provoker, "Too Much Johnson," will be the Alcazar's next attraction, commencing Monday night. It was last presented here about eight years ago when it ran four weeks in the old Alcazar, and its revival is in response to a popular demand that has been insistent ever since the Sutter-street playhouse was opened. Mr. Thurston Hall will have excellent assistance in his impersonation of the principal character. Grace Barbour, Adele Belgarde, Bessie Barriscale, Burt Wesner, Thomas Chatterton, Howard Hickman, Louis Bennison and Charles Gunn will be in the cast.

"Girls" at Ye Liberty

For the first time in Oakland and the first time anywhere at popular prices the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse will offer Clyde Fitch's "Girls" on next Monday evening. It was the last of that prolific writer's many farcical comedies and is considered by many his best effort in that line. The leading roles will be entrusted to Muriel Hope and Sydney Ayres and all the other Oakland stock favorites will appear in the long cast. After one week of "Girls" a production, on an elaborate scale, of "Richard Carvel" will be offered.

Colonel Forbes in Paris

Colonel Forbes of Marysville, a newspaper proprietor and politician who has ascended to the capitalistic class as an associate of W. P. Hammond and others, is just now in Paris having the time of his life. Colonel Forbes was never in Europe before, and he has youngster's gift of receiving lively impressions and enjoying everything that is unfamiliar. As the colonel moves over the tourist route he registers his impressions and experiences for the benefit of the at-home readers of one of his old papers in the Sacramento Valley and needless to say his articles are being read with avidity. Only recently the colonel discovered with unmitigated surprise that the United States had presented Paris with a statue of Lafayette paid for with the nickles of school children and he told the people of the Sacramento Valley all about it. He even went to the trouble of having the inscription translated, thereby showing himself a man of the thorough-going research.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Speculative activity in the stock market during the recent week has centered on Steel common which showed a record price. The rest of the market has been filled with cross currents which have proved disastrous to the trader. The market finished the week with a tone of heaviness, apparently as a result of a cessation of any bullish operations by banking syndicates. This might have been influenced somewhat by a money position at the close of the month which would warrant a continuance of the rise in prices; hence a reactionary tendency in securities or a resting period after a month's rise in values is not illogical, to say the least. A general improvement in trade circles is apparent and will assert itself in November and December by heavy equipment and rail orders by the leading transportation companies of the country. The steady decline in farm products of the country is a most favorable factor in the money outlook. Heavy foreign purchases of cotton and grains will result. While it is doubtful whether we can expect any material upward move in securities in the immediate future on top of an extended rise in stocks, we doubt if declines will be anything more than nominal before another bull move strikes Wall street later in the year.

Wheat—In all probability the grain trade has said goodbye to the dollar wheat in Chicago for a long time to come. This at least would probably be the verdict of any large and well posted body of grain merchants if they should gather and carefully weigh all the facts of the present situation. Overproduction is apparent in the markets of the world insofar as wheat is concerned. That this overproduction bids fair to become worse is evidenced by the large acreage that has been seeded in nearly all the wheat producing countries. Severe crop losses will be necessary to make any important change in the outlook. The world's shipments for the first four months of the 1910-11 crop year are now about 100 million bushels larger than for the corresponding period last year. Argentina has a good prospect from a larger area than last year.

Corn—In corn as in wheat a promising bull campaign carried on up to the last day of the week went wrong at the finish. The trade had been counting on a decline and the prospect of rough weather and a revival of the eastern demand to combine for an upheaval in prices or at least for a good rally. Rough weather did not appear. Instead, the trade enjoyed a turn to cold and clear weather which was an ideal condition for rapid curing of the naturally ripened crop. Eastern buyers also refused to be stimulated, despite the fact that the close of Lake navigation was but five weeks away. Meanwhile Argentina shipped enormously and was evidently hurrying to get in ahead of the new crop of the United States corn. Export buyers were shut out.

Cotton—The cotton market has been very active the past week with prices covering a range of about 75 points and winding up the week with the market about where it left off last Saturday. The Census report of last Monday was considered quite bullish, as it was last year, and it indicated a crop of about 10,500,000 bales. After further consideration by the trade it was generally conceded that the report, while on its face bullish, was in no way an indication of what the total crop might be. The crop this year is three weeks late and the next ginning report should show a big increase over last year as the weather has been very favorable for marketing new cotton and receipts have been large at all ports. Frost scares were numerous last week and while they have no doubt done considerable damage to the prospective top crop, they came so late in the season that it will not affect the total crop materially. Reports as to the growing crop early in the week were more favorable and crop estimates have been increased until now it is generally conceded that the crop will be above 12 million bales. Spot demand for cotton was urgent in the early part of the week but receipts have been so liberal that the southern markets are now quoting spot cotton one-fourth lower with only a limited demand. The market looks as though it will drag lower and with the elimination of crop scares the spot markets will be the dominating factor.

Local Securities—The real feature of the market for local stocks and bonds for the past week or so has been the daily gains in Pacific Gas & Electric common. This issue, by reason of the excellent prospects for dividends after the turn of the year, has taken quite a grip on the Eastern as well as on our home markets. From its price at the present writing (above 70) it would seem that the ultimate dividends will be larger than at first expected. Right now the quotations on these shares would seem to discount a 5 per cent dividend and should the advance continue for 10 points more, dividends of 6 per cent would not be surprising. Reports from reliable sources still maintain that the lease of the Western Power Company by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company under the terms published in these columns last week is an assured fact. Certainly the price of Western Power common (now 45) indicates that information of importance to stock holders is soon to be officially announced. Of the regularly listed stocks and bonds there is little to say. The market in this department has continued quiet and shows but few changes.

right kind of stuff in them. Pretty soon George Horace Lorimer suggested to Blythe that it would be mutually advantageous if Blythe would join the staff of the Saturday Evening Post and write "Who's Who" for a public of some ten million people. That was four years ago and Blythe has been doing it ever since.

Success has not spoiled Sam Blythe. The newspaper fraternity is quick to resent the "airs" of a companion who has made good and to discipline him into a humble estimate of his success. But Blythe has always remained the same modest, good-humored, sensible fellow that he was before publishers were bidding for his productions. He goes about the country a great deal and has friends everywhere and wherever he goes his brethren of the pad and pencil are glad to see him. Perhaps they know his worth better than most other people. Certainly they realize more keenly than others what a tremendous influence he exerts on American politics. And to keep abreast of what is going on behind the scenes in politics they read him assiduously. A newspaperman read assiduously by newspapermen! In the list of Blythe's distinctions that is unique.

Spellbound, Suzanne abandoned herself. Gently Andre raised her head, and her face appeared, tearful, the eyelids lowered, pale as that of one crucified.

He murmured rapturously: "How beautiful you are, and how I love you!"

He lifted her in his arms, she dared for one second to look at him, then twice her timid eyes turned away dazzled and trembling. She hid her face upon Andre's shoulder. She dared not believe it yet. It was impossible. The happiness was too great.

"You are beautiful, Suzanne! I love you!"

A short sigh stifled itself in Suzanne's throat; then, as she did not stir, overcome with joyful emotion:

"I love you!" he repeated.

A smile, token of utter content, dawned upon her parted lips. She dared look at him again. Their eyes met, their glances penetrated and each recognized in the other the being to whom he had belonged since the beginning of all time.

They whispered in the same breath: "You!" "You!"

Then both were silent. Suzanne at last believed.

Her beauty—she saw it in the mirror of his living eyes; she felt it born of her ardent will; and it rose from her heart, bursting into the glory of her exquisite pallor, into the flame of her eyes, the rose-red of her happy mouth.

But already Andre's lips sought hers. Shyness overwhelmed her, now that at last he could see, and she trembled as at his first kiss.

AN IMPORTANT BANK MERGER

The merger of the Western National Bank and the Metropolis Trust and Savings Bank, announcement of which was made some time ago, went into effect on Monday when the two banking institutions became the Western Metropolis National Bank and opened under that name at Market and New Montgomery streets, the location of the Metropolis Trust and Savings Bank. The consolidation of the two banks with more than 10,000 accounts and deposits aggregating a little over $4,000,000 forms one of the strongest financial institutions in the city, and the number of depositors indicate that both banks were popular. Alfred L. Meyerstein, president of the Western Metropolis National Bank, was president of the savings bank while John H. Spring vice-president of the new bank, was president and Cashier Wm. C. Murdoch Jr. was cashier of the Western National Bank. The entire office force of the two banks, it is announced, will be retained as they will be needed to handle the combined business. The directors of the new consolidated bank are: Alfred L. Meyerstein, John M. Keith, A. A. Watkins, G. H. Umbsen, John H. Spring, Gavin McNab, Geo. C. Boardman, Robert Oxnard, C. A. Hawkins, Charles Hagmaie and Harry Stetson.

Auto Notes

In the big automobile parade recently given under the auspices of the Cleveland Automobile Club, White Gasoline trucks showed up to advantage, taking more prizes than any other one make car. The Sweepstake prize, according to addresses received by C. A. Hawkins, Pacific Coast manager of the White Co., was won by a beautifully decorated White truck carrying a White Gasoline touring car loaded with passengers. Two other White trucks took prizes also, one belonging to the Diamond Rubber Co.

That preparations are being made for winter touring is indicated by the number of limousines and coupes that are being delivered to local motorists. Prominent among these are the Hupmobile coupes which have found an unusual demand since their recent arrival in the San Francisco market. Complete disposition of the first shipments of this small inside drive machine has been made and S. G. Chapman is now unloading some new arrivals.

The increased use of motorcycles this past season has attached additional importance to the construction of motorcycle tires. This is having its effect on the various big rubber factories, practically all of which have made preparations for a decidedly larger output of motorcycle tires this coming year. Prominent among these is the Morrison & Wright plant.

The local branch of the Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. has just been advised from Wichita, Kansas, that Firestone tires received more publicity at the recent Hutchinson Auto Race Meet than all makes combined.

Barney Oldfield, the world's undisputed champion automobile driver, is a consistent user of Harris Oil. A letter recently written by him to H. Harris Oil Co. has been forwarded to the local branch of the Chanslor & Lyon Motor Supply Co. It reads: "Using Harris Oil made New World's Circular Track Record today with my lap at the Brighton Beach Motordrome."

The Pioneer Automobile Co. has just been advised by the Lozier Co. that Charles A. Schieren, mayor of the city of Brooklyn and one of the most prominent men of the New York Civic Society, has ordered a 1911 Lozier Limousine. Mr. Schieren purchased a Lozier chain-drive car in 1907, and in 1909 he purchased a car of another make and one of the best known high-class cars in America. The fact that he has returned to the Lozier speaks for itself.

Interesting information concerning automobile conditions in Western Canada has just been brought to San Francisco by W. C. Hood, sales manager of the Chalmers Motor Car Co., who has just returned from an extensive trip through that territory. The American made cars are in great demand. Mr. Hood was particularly well pleased with the business being done there by the various Chalmers agencies.

Calvin C. Eib, vice-president of the Pioneer Automobile Co., who is spending a few weeks in Nevada recuperating from a recent illness, is taking advantage of the opportunity of studying automobile conditions in the sage-brush State. In a letter to E. Brinegar, Eib stated that outside the mining districts the sale of autos in Nevada had in the past been comparatively light. Because of this a few of the standard makes are represented here as yet, and there is a decided scarcity of reliable agencies.

Raymond Duncan, the Grecian enthusiast, has, since his arrival in San Francisco, been using a Chalmers "30" car, furnished him by the Pioneer Automobile Co. He expects to make several tours to the surrounding country.

Don't Buy a Discount Buy a Motor Car

There is a big difference between a cut price and a bargain.

An unknown broker might advertise a cut price on diamonds but that would not be a bargain. It would be a chance. Should Tiffany advertise cut prices on a diamond that would be a bargain. But Tiffany will not advertise such cut prices because Tiffany diamonds are real diamonds.

A cut Car either was not worth in the beginning what was asked for it or it has depreciated in value as compared with other cars selling at the same price.

CHALMERS CARS made the only cut in their prices when they were first built three years ago. Then they came on the market the first real automobile that ever sold for less than $1500. They have not found it necessary to make further cuts because they are genuine cars and their original price represented unusual value.

When you buy a CHALMERS you buy a Motor Car.

Letters

"My Brother's Keeper."

After "The Day of Souls" it is natural to expect something better from Charles Tenney Jackson than a commonplace "he and she" romance. "My Brother's Keeper" will meet the expectation. The dominating character is a puzzling compound to readers as well as to his associates. The only son of a millionaire manufacturer and judge of the superior court, he has elected to become a tramp and is a self-confessed murderer. Educated for the ministry of the Presbyterian church, he has been expelled from the ranks of its clergy. Appearing to sneer at all the well-meant efforts of sociological reforms he yet gives his life to save that of a malefactor and protect the reputation of those who were at fault for the boy's mistake. At one stage of the proceedings anything that would eliminate him from the earth without precipitating a scandal would have been hailed with joy and at another he is looked upon as the saviour of all the rest. Perhaps if Herford Rand had been more of the ideally apostolic type, slender, graceful, effeminate, with appealing eyes and a carefully cultivated attitude of "turn the other cheek," he might have looked the part he played, but when a man has lived roughly, is inclined to stoutness, ungainly, with small grey eyes and a biting tongue it seems natural to push him into the seat of the scornful. He appears to be a poseur, an actor, but in the sequel it seems that it is the artificiality of the others which gives a distorted appearance to his attitude. The elder Rand, many times a millionaire, the owner of a southern cotton mill, is something of a recluse. Years before he had quarreled with his only son for a supposed infraction of the moral code. While abroad, and well supplied with means he had one day bought from a strolling player a child who was singing for stray pennies—bought her as he might have bought pins or shoe laces, so far as the vendor cared. She was put to school, a little thing of eight or so, and given her chance in life, but some gossip catching a thread of the story, sent home a scandalous distortion, and Herford, disdaining explanation, was expelled by the synod. Now, returning, he was to find this girl, grown to womanhood, the wife of a Professor Ennisley, a protege of his father's, and living in comfortable ease in his old home. Ennisley was a cozy-corner socialist, a brilliant talker whose fine speeches and argument were gotten up for him by his private secretary, a Jewish girl, who idealized him and gave freely of her time and labor. Ennisley, of course, believed in himself and his mother idolized him. Demetra, the wife, was comfortably selfish and did not greatly care as long as she was warm and well fed. Ennisley was the star talker of his cult, always in demand to address women's clubs and civic societies. His great hope was to prevail upon his patron to leave his fortune for benevolent projects so that the millions would pass through if not into the Ennisley hands and his great fear that a reconciliation with the son might be brought about, to the disturbance of the Ennisley ease. While Herford was still lingering in Chicago some labor troubles at the mills assumed a violent aspect. Ennisley's hope that the trouble would be adjusted proved vain, for some of his own proteges took his preaching literally, believed there was something behind his words, and assumed that revolution meant actual overturning and friendship and brotherhood meant recognition and assistance, so, when a bomb was thrown from the steps of his own clubhouse and five policemen were killed, he was in distress lest the outcome should be his own disgrace, and when the miscreant, assisted by his comrades, made his way to Chicago, to the Rand home and demanded the recognition and encomiums of his "brother" there was consternation not lessened by Demetra's discovery that the young anarchist was one of her own brothers left behind when she climbed out of the pit by Herford Rand's timely help and on the proceeds of whose labor and that of his kind she was now lapped in luxury. Instead of receiving Stanislaus with open arms the problem was how to get rid of him, a labor quickly and easily shirked to the shoulders of Herford Rand who, not being a "leader," had nothing to lose. Later, when on the eve of a reconciliation with his father Stanislaus again intruded, and sister and teacher stood apart and denied him, it was Herford who, casting aside every thing, claimed the wretch as his comrade, invented a plausible story and saved the others from the exposure they dreaded, for Judge Rand could hardly condemn his own son in his own house. Whether he was fool or madman it was difficult for them to judge but in any case he had staved off the necessity for avowal and their comfort was outwardly still secure. But Herford Rand was like a chemical solvent. His presence was a disturbing element, and there was no mental rest until some of the shams were stripped off and they saw themselves as they were. Open confession cleared away some of the clouds but character is not built in a day and one cannot imagine a woman as essentially self-centered as Demetra being long troubled by a series of events which, however soul-shattering at the moment, still left her in possession of creature comforts, while the Professor Ennisleys, who are all words and belief in themselves would need to be pulled entirely apart and remade. "Greater love hath no man than this, that he give his life for another," and yet, when one is so indifferent to mere living as Herford Rand appears to be one wonders whether it was not as lightly yielded as he disposed of his goods, to any who might need. "My Brother's Keeper" is a strong story, not impossible if one can first imagine such a character as Herford Rand who cares for none of the things that money can buy and if he is concerned for the opinions of men, carefully hides it under a mask of indifference. There are Ennisleys by the score in these days, who make a comfortable living by preaching doctrines they would be hard put to if expected to practice. The story is compact and well written. There is no padding, no straining after effects. It tells itself and from the first moment, when the hunted man scans the police offices across the street and a block away to the last line, when the comfort-lapped Ennisleys vaguely recall Louise, the energetic secretary as a quiet, faithful girl who would be lonely but for her work, the interest never flags. From the Bobbs-Merrill Co.

"For a spring chicken, madam," said Dawson, "I must confess that I consider this a pretty tough bird."

"Yes, Mr. Dawson," replied the landlady, amiably, "but you must remember that we have had a pretty tough spring."

BENEATH YOUR FAT A GRACEFUL FIGURE DWELLS

Heredity, natural tendency, inaction, high living, and inability of the system to dispose of fatty foods are responsible for the pads and rolls of fat which gather on chest, hip, waist, chin, cheeks, and neck, covering up and distorting the lithe, graceful figure beneath. To remove or prevent these unwelcome deposits—control their quantity and location without paying the price of violent exercise, dieting, self-denials or impairment of health; in short, to find one own slim self beneath the fatty sheath—has been made possible by a noted physician, whose Marmola Prescription helped thousands of over-fat men and women to reduce safely and surely from 10 to 16 ounces per day, until the natural health of the system is restored and slimness results. Marmola Prescription Tablets, the new form of the great remedy, each contain an exact dose of the famous Marmola Prescription. Like the original prescription, they are absolutely sure and harmless. Nearly every druggist keeps these wonderful little tablets, or they may be secured direct by mail from the Marmola Co., 1220 Monroe Ave. Detroit, Mich. 75 cents for a large case is the uniform price.

Exit Theodore

The Democratic landslide that occurred last Tuesday gives the people substantial assurance that Theodore Roosevelt is no longer a menace to the prosperity or the integrity of this nation. New Nationalism has gone a-glimmering. The repudiation of its prophet is as emphatic as could be desired even by the few who formed an accurate estimate of his character and who appreciated the evil effects of his mischievous preachments on public sentiment. We need be no longer apprehensive of the arts and wiles of this reckless political mountebank. From his machinations we have been delivered, and now we should all be exceedingly gratified at having received fresh assurance that all the people are not to be fooled all the time; but in the midst of general exultation over the averting of a national calamity it may be well to reflect that for the revolt against the man who wrecked his party and played havoc with a nation's industries the people are not deserving of a great amount of credit. The happy consummation was due not so much to their intelligence as to the egregious egotism of the man who was once their idol. Intoxicated with the fumes of public homage he was guilty of excesses that exposed him to the contempt of the most credulous and purblind of his former devotees. The Roosevelt that returned from Africa was the same Roosevelt that occupied the White House; as much entitled to public confidence since his Smithsonian mission as before; no less qualified to direct public sentiment since his exit from public office than when as Chief Magistrate of the nation he dominated all the departments of government and awed the people with his frown.

The State Election

Apparently anti-Roosevelt sentiment has yet to make itself felt in California. The triumph of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League, however, must not be taken as conclusive of the failure of that sentiment to cross the continent. We may more nearly approximate the truth if we conclude that the Hon. Hiram Johnson was ejected despite the enthusiasm with which he sneered at President Taft and affirmed his loyalty to the now defunct mountebank. There were many elements that contributed to Mr. Johnson's election, the strongest, perhaps, being the hostile attitude toward his opponent of the Democratic machine in this city which is controlled by the Hon. James D. Phelan. Mr. Bell was under great disadvantage in this city owing both to the lack of district organization and the sympathy of many of the Democratic machine leaders with the powerful cabal of which Mr. Johnson is the personal representative. Our expectations were disappointed by Mr. Bell's defeat, but we feel that far more important than his election was that of Justices Melvin and Sloss. No greater calamity could have befallen this State than that which might have come upon us as a result of the candidacy of Judge Lawlor. Notwithstanding Mr. Johnson's affiliations and temperamental defects he is not devoid of self-respect, and besides he is a man of some ability. He may give us a satisfactory administration. But Judge Lawlor is impossible. His candidacy would have been a huge joke had there not been the possibility of his being swept into office on a tidal wave. His defeat proves in a measure that when it comes to the selection of ministers of justice the people are cautious and not to be persuaded to elevate to the most important department of State the puppet of a coterie. The repudiation of Judge Lawlor is gratifying for many reasons. One of these reasons is that he was ardently supported by the Boughten Bulletin, the journal that is understood to be the keeper of his conscience, and that has no stronger interest than that of gratifying the vindictiveness of its masters. The boughten journal's impotency has received fresh illustration. It was bitterly opposed to the election of Justice Melvin, who incurred its disfavor by rebuking Francis J. Heney. One of its pet aversions is Julius Kahn who has been re-elected to Congress. Barclay Henley to whom it gave a certificate of character was badly beaten. When it tried to elect Francis J. Heney he was beaten by ten thousand. In San Francisco to which its circulation is confined there has been comparatively little enthusiasm for Johnson. And even Judge Coffey seems to have suffered from its ministrations in his behalf, for the Bulletin has sought to create the impression that he was in sympathy with its designs and purposes. Evidently the Bulletin has a blighting effect on almost everything it espouses.

The Election Peril

Not since the days of the Broderick-Gwin contest has there been witnessed in California a campaign so rancorous as the one through which we have just passed. It was distinctly a campaign of personalities, the staple of which was a compound of rage and lunacy. Yet a campaign of this character is by no means singular. It is proverbial that elections breed distempers, and consequently wise statesmen in all ages have advised the people to hold as few as possible. To elections Edmund Burke traced the downfall of nations and Abraham Lincoln warned the people of this country that the greatest of all dangers to be guarded against was the demoralization resulting from the "incessant human wriggle and struggle for office." The tendency of elections is to paralyze sentiment and imagination, extinguish charity, create destructive feuds, and destroy that confidence in human virtue which lies at the foundation of philanthropy and generous sacrifices. All of which has been well illustrated in the late campaign not only in this State but throughout the country. The people ought to heed the lesson. It is about time for intelligent men to perceive that a double election twice each year, necessitating our preoccupation with politics for nearly five months out of every twelve, is a thing fraught with peril and not to be perpetuated. But we are all being urged to provide for more elections, and to that end to adopt the crazy recall proposition, a catholicon grounded in the theory that municipal government is to be improved by giving the small minority composed of the chronic disgruntled the power to plunge the whole community into the excitement of election whenever they may feel so disposed. We can conceive of but one sentiment to be urged in its favor: that it might hasten the revolt of public sentiment against the frequency of elections and produce a reaction in favor of holding all our elections, national, State and municipal, on the same day, once in four years. Here is a consummation the prospect of which would cause every anarchist in the country to frothe at the mouth.

The Free Press

At brief intervals somebody takes occasion to remind us that when the press is free the voice of truth is heard and reason controls the passions of the people. This is a superstition that has adhered to the mind of man ever since Milton wrote his Areopagitica. And yet the voice of truth has become a voice in a wilderness of printing presses drowned in a din of riotous unreason to which the passions of the people are forever prey. When Milton argued for the "Liberty of Unlicensed Printing" the facts were in his favor. In those days as the rabble couldn't read pamphleteers had to appeal to men of intelligence. It was consequently useless to prevaricate and fatal to be absurd. No man with an audience had the audacity to write himself down either a liar or an ass. But nowadays we have daily newspapers that indulge in as inanity and prevarication with equal facility much to the gratification of the circulation manager. There are editorials appearing in our newspapers every day which to Milton would have been incredible. Take for example the Examiner's editorial telling the people that they should vote for the initiative, the referendum and the recall because these populist hobbies do not meet with the approval of the United Railroads. The corporation's disapproval is urged as conclusive of the proposition that the masse should be required to vote for new servant every time anybody can induce seven thousand people to sign a petition for an election. Many are the base uses to which the printing press has been put since Areopagitica was written. Of late it has fallen into the hands of men who lie till they're black in the face without fear of being scorned or shunned. The habitual liar, especially the one that lies to injure others, in all walks of life save that of journalism is a being detested and abhorred. But the lying editor seems to be regarded as an impersonal entity. His newspaper may be a notorious disseminator of untruths without affecting his social status in the slightest degree. He goes unrebuked, feared by the many, despised by the few. We have editors who lie not merely with impunity but with elation, as for instance the editors of the Call and Bulletin, who during the late campaign told a good lie with so much art and plausibility about a meeting in San Francisco between Patrick Calhoun (who was two thousand miles away) and Theodore Bell that doubtless these distinguished journalists have been felicitating each other ever since. Between editors of this type and editors of the type of the Examiner man who isn't satisfied with two elections every year as at present ordained, the people who rely on the printing press for the voice of truth and the guidance of reason are in the predicament of the mariner in a fog on a rock-bound coast who can hear nothing but the roar of the breakers.

The Great Awakener

Some men are so tenacious of their opinions, so reluctant to admit they have been in error, that when the props which have seemed to support their judgment have been removed, and no principle is to be found to serve as a hook to hang it on, they contrive an assumption which it is impossible either to vindicate or logically dispute. Thus, we find that men who were once convinced of the supermanic character of Theodore Roosevelt, and whose imagination is no longer in thrall, are now, for self-satisfaction, justifying their extravagant hero-worship on the ground that the idol of their hearts quickened the lethargic conscience of his countrymen. With all his faults, they say, he was the instrument by which was accomplished the resurrection of a people insensible to shame. They assert that the awakening which he effected compensates for all the evils that he thrust upon us. So, we are told, whatever we may think of Mr. Roosevelt, of his motives, his principles or his policies, we must at least pay the homage due to him as The Great Awakener. Not in our judgment must we do anything of the kind. Nor do we believe that history will do so. We go so far as to harbor the opinion that there has been no awakening, that there has been nothing more than a spasm of unrest accompanied by a thirst for innovation. The general concern for the welfare of the nation we conceive to be in reality no greater now than it has been at any time in the past. The impression prevails that improved methods for the promotion of that welfare have been invented, but it remains to be seen whether we are awake or merely dreaming. And as to the spasm aforesaid, whether it be for good or evil, our recollection of the matter is that it was induced long before Colonel Roosevelt ascended that obscure acclivity known as Kettle Hill. The storm-clouds that emitted thunders on the heads of malefactors of great wealth were gathering long before that beneficent mountebank, Thomas

Lawson, startled us with his revelations and disclosures. We remember that when the uproariously virtuous magazines were in the white heat of their indignation against capitalistic combines Mr. Roosevelt, then President of the United States, raised his hands in protest against the propagators of class hatred; and that to ticket and label them and to mark them out for men's scorn and contempt, he borrowed from Bunyan a nickname that has stuck to them like a plaster ever since. By him were they styled muckrakers. That was before he perceived the potentialities of muckraking in the profitable game of politics. In those days the great exponent of the science of exigencies was a standpat conservative, enjoying the confidence and esteem of that incarnation of the vested interests Mr. E. H. Harriman. The truth is that the pampered darling of opportunity, our so-called Great Awakener, himself asleep at the switch when the greatest movement of his day was thundering by, experienced an awakening just in time to get aboard. But he made up for lost time. Taking the seat of the engineer and acting as his own stoker, he supplied fuel to the flames and gave great impetus to the movement that he made his own. It is not to be denied that Mr. Roosevelt directed public sentiment. It is merely to be questioned whether we should be grateful for his steering. Our notion is that in penitential mood accentuated with sackcloth and ashes we should forever pray to be chastised for our folly. Let us at least reflect that whatever change was wrought in public sentiment was made possible not by any inherent force of character, but by the prestige of a great office. Clothed with all the dignity and sanctity of that office, vested with the presumption of superior wisdom, an empiric of statecraft with genius for nothing but bronco-busting suddenly found himself the duly constituted guide, philosopher and friend of all the people. Consider that the people of a great nation, who flatter themselves that they are fit for self-government, once upon a time permitted their imagination to be captivated by a man with nothing more than a swagger, strong passions and a keen eye for the main chance. Who can ponder the meteoric career of this curious product of democracy without perceiving that in an era of equality there is always great danger of the triumph of mediocrity. This was the man, then, that wrought a change in public sentiment. True it is that by this picturesque personality was the public conscience quickened; by this child of whimsical destiny, distinguished for his incapacity to exhibit either philosophic calm or sober judgment. But now, to the question of the effect of Mr. Roosevelt's exercise of a great prerogative. It was certainly prodigious. For Mr. Roosevelt had the courage of his predilections. He was not like the bull in the china shop indifferent to consequences, but he was as blind to them as were the Encyclopedists that precipitated the French Revolution. During Mr. Roosevelt's administration we saw the White House converted into a bear garden, and under his tutelage we saw new principles of conduct come into vogue.

But did he really improve our morals? "Learn what a people glory in," we are told, "and you may learn much of both their theory and practice of morals." The people of this country gloried in Roosevelt, and his ways became their ways. His mind reacted on the society that created him. He became the inspiration of all the irreconcilable antipathies that mark the political strife that has been raging over this country with something of the bitterness and fury of the feuds between the Vitelli and Orsini, the Guelphs and the Ghibbelines. Surely it is not conducive to good morals to have our passions perpetually played upon. It may have been necessary to quicken our conscience, but it was not necessary to take everything for granted that served for nourishment for the spleen. It was to the spleen that Mr. Roosevelt catered incessantly. He made reviling the popular pastime. In argument he reduced the syllogism to an epithet. "He who wishes to exert a useful influence," said Goethe, "must be careful to insult nothing." Our half-baked moralist was careful to insult everybody and everything. He preached the obvious virtues through a megaphone, but those that make perfect the character of the gentlemen were never dreamt of in his Wild West philosophy. Temperamentally inclined to indulge his hasty feelings to the utmost, he was never anything if not impulsive and dogmatic; seldom was he charitable, often cruel. If we may be permitted the use of a copy-book platitude in a discussion of the most celebrated of platitudinarians, we shall observe that there can be no virtue without justice. Now the just man, though he hates evil, always hopes that those who are accused will be able to establish their innocence. Not such was ever the hope of Mr. Roosevelt. As President of the United States he did not scruple at prejudging men accused of crime; did not scruple, indeed, at pressing down the scales of justice with the weight of his authority. There were many other things that he did not scruple at, some of which have since become sanctified by distinguished usage; such, for example, as the employment of a stolen letter for the advancement of the greater good. So on the whole we are inclined to the opinion that as a moralist Mr. Roosevelt was worse than a failure, being a breeder of bad ethics. As the prophet of a morality inspired and vitalized by the religion of strenuosity and strife he was a demoralizing rather than a refining influence. In all probability history will pronounce him one of time's revenges on a self-satisfied people.

Patriots as Blackmailers

The revolutionists of Portugal are experiencing the usual difficulties in whipping their new government into shape. Indeed they are making such slow work of it that the Powers may shortly step in and prescribe such drastic measures as will impel the people to recall Manuel to his throne. If Dr. Braga cannot bring order out of chaos in Lisbon there is not much likelihood of his regulating affairs in Portugal's colonial possessions in Africa which happen to be very attractive both to England and Germany. And from recent despatches it must be inferred that the situation is far from being well in hand. The men on the warship that bombarded the palace, and the rank and file of the army that contributed to the success of the revolution, have demanded that they be pensioned for life, and we are told that the "Government" is thinking of acceding to the demand out of a sense of danger. In other words the "Government" is on the point of being blackmailed. The circumstance is an eloquent commentary on the spirit and motives of the men who were supposed to have overthrown the Braganza dynasty from love of country and a consuming passion for liberty.

The Neglected Poet

Our magazine editors are a bad lot, and consequently any reproach leveled at them ought to meet with general approval. That they have been "terribly derelict in their duty to the soul of the nation" as is charged by a poet in an open-letter to a poet on the "correspondence" page of this week's Town Talk, no intelligent person will doubt. But to characterize as "derelict" the sordid merchants of magazinedom who poison public opinion with decomposed stuff and nonsense is to indulge in poetic imagery too feeble to convey an adequate idea of their villainy. The poet, however, confines himself to but one viewpoint—that of the poet whose verses have "come back." Of all the high crimes and misdemeanors chargeable upon the editors of our vulgar magazines, there is but one that excites the indignation of the child-like protege of the Muses: their cold-blooded indifference to poetry, which is responsible for the inability of poets to earn their bread in the sweat of their deathless effusions. This is no new grievance. It has agitated the souls of poets through the centuries. And there was a time when it deserved the serious consideration of mankind. That was before there was much poetry in the world. At present there is no longer necessity for a continuous production of poetry. The world is over-stocked with the treasures of poetic genius. There is no more reason for a poet to go on making poetry for which there is no demand than there would be for a man to go on making cheeses if there were no market for them; that is, if the poet felt that he should be rewarded in cash. The poet who feels that poetry is its own exceeding great reward is justified in toiling on and heroically endeavoring to animate neglected truth and to impregnate ideas with a fresh store of emotion. But let him not suppose that he is rendering any great public service. The poet who reveals to us the loveliness of nature, who animates the spirit of beauty, who helps us to think accurately and feel truly, what service does he render which otherwise we should have to do without? There are many hundred feet of book shelves laden with poetry that suffices for all the purposes to which the idle singers of an empty day devote their talents and their genius. If a man were to devote all his leisure moments to the reading of the good poetry deserving of his study that was produced in the generations ago he would be occupied down to the hour of his death. So the question may be raised as to whether our contemporary poets are not doing more harm than good inasmuch as they distract attention from poetry that ought to be read. Admitting that a few of them are making valuable contributions to literature, to give them the kind of encouragement that is clamored for is to make the reading of current poetry a habit, and this may not be advisable, since what is truly valuable in current poetry is in the proportion of a gopherhole to the Grand Canyon. Of excellent poetry we get very little nowadays, and what is not excellent is worse than worthless. Of course every poet thinks that his verses are excellent, but as the test of excellence in poetry according to high authority, is the inability of the public to appreciate it during the life of the poet, then every poet should be in dread of worldly success. But aside from all question of merit it would please us to see all poets prosper, and yet we feel that even a hungry poet, possessed as he is reported to be of extraordinary spiritual assets, is better off than the average man. Whatever be his condition on this planet he has much coming to him on his death. His great reward is posthumous fame more enduring than brass. The verses of Homer have survived the statues of Cyrus and Caesar. When we find a poet clamoring for recognition and bemoaning his failure from the commercial standpoint we wonder whether he really has the divine gift of song. For it is hard to believe that the true poet would crave the recognition of the public. The true poet knows that it is better to deserve success than to achieve it. The successful poet must always suspect that he is a failure. The poet is for posterity. When a writer of verse gets on as a verssmith the probability is that he is destined to be neglected by succeeding generations. And when a true poet is so unfortunate as to meet with success then the usual result is a loss to mankind. It was so in the case of Wordsworth, as Browning tells us; also, in the case of Burns. There appears to be nothing, then, for the poet to do, who is down on his luck, but to devote himself to his art with an unselfish eagerness to contribute to the spiritual wealth of mankind. When he sinks into the Nirvana of neglect he has the consolation of feeling that perhaps he is destined to become a classic.

How Homer Arrived

When Homer first set out to write,
His modesty was such
That, though his stuff was pretty good,
It never caught on much,
Until one day a friend remarked,
"Old man, if you are wise,
You'll drop the shrinking violet style
And start to advertise."

He took the tip. * * * The Argus Mail
Next week came out with this:
Olympic Games,
What Homer Thinks,
Exclusive Chat. (Don't Miss).
He gave his views on every point
That vexed the Grecian mind;
His name each morning in the press
You never failed to find.

So when the Odyssey appeared,
It sold like anything,
The Spartan serial rights brought in
The ransom of a king. * * *
And Homer fingering his checks,
Went out and slew, it's said,
Two oxen to the god of booms
Before he went to bed.

Perspective Impressions

The joe-cannon is a bird that never moults a feather.

The probability is now that Hiram will not only eat but drink and be merry.

Perhaps the best kind of past for a candidate to acquire is one in which the public cannot be persuaded to believe.

Theodore is down for the count. He can't come back.

It is the irony of fate that puts Thanksgiving Day in the same month in which we hold our elections.

By the way, Judge Lawlor comes up for re-election next year. How foolish it was for him to get prematurely into the limelight.

Teddy blames it on the tariff. Nothing like having a scapegoat ready to hand.

In the election of Judge Melvin notwithstanding the opposition of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League and its pharisaical leaders there is an object lesson for trimmers of the judiciary who sometimes are to be found nursing a vaulting ambition in very high places.

Tolstoi's Suppressed Book

A Realistic Picture of Village Life Which May Constitute the Last Public Utterance of the Great Russian but Which Premier Stolypin Has Ordered Seized and Destroyed

By Albert Wolfe

The Russian Government has just ordered the seizure of every copy of "Three Days in a Village," Count Tolstoi's latest and in some respects most interesting and intimate word to the world in conditions in Russia. The pamphlet which has so aroused Premier Stolypin is a very brief one and consists of three parts. It is a plain recital of three days spent in a village in the vicinity of Count Tolstoi's estate. There are no attempts to put on gresome colors, no flights of eloquence, no appeals to tears, wrath or fear. Plainly and soberly runs the narrative, and like a curious thread interwoven into its fabric runs the personality of the great teacher in his intimate relations, now with the homeless wanderer who comes for a meal and aid, now with his neighbor-peasants who seek his aid in sickness or trouble, now with the authorities, who treat him with a quaint deference not unmixed with suppressed annoyance, like some courtier humoring a lunatic potentate.

The first part of this narrative treats of "Wandering Folks," the second is entitled "Living and Dying," and the third "Taxes." The cumulative effect is one of heartbreaking hopelessness and misery, and it ends in a brief but scathing arraignment of the unhappy people's rulers. Having related some illustrations of the ruin of tax-ridden village folk, Count Tolstoi concludes his tale with these words: "But the ministers and those who guide this trade in vodka, and those who are busy with sentencing to exile, to jail, to hard labor, to hanging, all of the ministers and their helpers—they are fully convinced that the samovars, the sheep, the linens, the calves levied from these paupers, find their highest use in the manufacture of vodka which poisons the people, and in the building of jails and prisons, and incidentally in the distribution of salaries among them and their helpers, in the decoration of their parlors, in purchasing attires for their wives, in the necessary expenses of traveling and amusement indulged in by way of relief from the arduous labors in behalf of this uncouth and ungrateful people."

"Lately something entirely new has been the experience of our villages, something never seen or heard before," begins the first part of Count Tolstoi's narrative. "Every day there come to our village, which counts eighty homesteads, from six to a dozen hungry, cold and ragged wayfarers. These people, all in rags, filthy in the extreme, come to our village and seek out the constable. The constable, to keep them from dying in the street from cold and starvation, takes them about among the villagers, meaning by villagers the peasants. The constable does not take them to the landowner who has, in addition to his ten sleeping apartments, dozens of other places, in the office, in the stable, in the laundry, in the servants' hall and elsewhere; nor does he take them to the priest or the deacon, nor to the merchant, all of whom have houses which may not be large, but are still roomy, but he takes them to the peasant, whose whole family, wife and mother-in-law, children big and little, live all in one room eight or ten arshins long. And the owner receives this hungry, frozen, evil smelling and filthy man and not only provides him with a night's lodging, but also feeds him.

"Sitting down to eat," a peasant told me, "we can't leave him out. The meal wouldn't taste well. And so we feed him and give him tea."

Sometimes two and three and ten such visitors will be on hand to share the humble accommodations and the still humbler fare, says Count Tolstoi. The army of these wayfarers has increased alarmingly in Russia, hopeless, wretched and practically starving, but for the tender mercies of the wretchedly poor peasants in the Russian villages.

He finds that but for the kindness of the impoverished peasants, the sole preservers of true Christian charity in Russia, these desperate and homeless wanderers would turn on the well-to-do and inaugurate an era of violence and rapine in the unsettled sections of the country that would be too appalling to contemplate.

Ten to fifteen petitioners for aid call on the Count every day. Among them are many beggars for life; some there are without arms, others without legs, many blind; now and then some women and even children. In reply to questions as to where they are bound for they all say that they are looking for work. Or others had been in search of work and are returning home, discouraged. Some are coming back from exile. There are drunkards and illiterates among them, but also many who are intelligent, modest and bashful men, and again others who are bold and insistent.

Having described a particularly insolent visitor, Count Tolstoi remarks: "There are many such insistent beggars, claiming it as their right to demand their share from the rich. They are mostly men who can read, for whom the revolution had not passed in vain. These people see in the rich not men seeking to save their souls by almsgiving, as did the beggars of old, but robbers, thieves who are sucking the blood of the working people; often indeed such a beggar does no work himself and in every way avoids work, but he thinks that it is not only his right but his duty in the name of the people to hate the despoilers of the people, meaning the rich, and he hates them with the full fury of his necessity; when he begs instead of demanding he is merely dissembling."

Still there are many men of a different type entirely brought down to the miserable life of tramping through Russia.

"One had been exiled by administrative order and had lived in Wiatka. What had you been doing? 'Newspaperman.' How did you get into trouble? 'Spreading illegal literature.' Then we spoke about the revolution. I told him my opinion, saying that everything is within our own self; such a mighty force cannot be overcome by force. Evil outside of our self will disappear when it disappears from within ourselves. 'That's so, but it takes too much time.' It depends on you. 'I read your book about the revolution. That was not mine, but those were my own thoughts.' Then after a little talk about this, that and the other, the Count remarks to his visitor: 'What a waste of power. What a pity that men like you will insist on spoiling their own lives. Tell me, now, what do you intend to do?' The tramp had been conversing cheerily and nonchalantly, but the first personal question, of actual sympathy, from man to man broke him down and he burst out in a paroxysm of tears. Such people are pitiful; they stand on the threshold which to cross means to enter the field of despair, where a man, even originally well disposed, is capable of anything.

The Vandals of whom Henry George spoke, twenty years ago, are ready in Russia. These Vandals are particularly terrible in Russia, where there is either a deeply religious feeling or an utter absence of the same, but no force of public opinion, an orderly common obedience to dictates of decency.

"I frequently receive letters from this class of people, principally from among the exiles. They know that I had written that one should not resist evil, and frequently they reply to me, fervently though illiterately that in view of what the authorities are doing to the people, the people's only reply can be: 'Vengeance, vengeance and vengeance!'"

The Government is blind to the fact that in trying to disarm its foes it only increases their number, and they are growing to be a menace and a terror to the Government, to the rich—and to those who dwell among the rich.

"The Living and Dying," the Second Day in a Village, is a succession of pictures of misery among the villagers themselves. First comes a woman begging the Count's aid. Her husband, her sole support, has been drafted into the army. They have nothing to eat. The children are practically starving. The petitioner herself is brought down so low physically that she cannot nurse her youngest.

The Count and a physician living in his house take a ride over to the authorities of the village, where unlawfully the sole supporter of the family had been taken away from his loved ones. The clerk in charge of the conscription lists claims that the husband had a brother living and that the woman had been lying. The Count and the physician are continuing their investigation. On the way they meet a girl of twelve, an orphan and the head of a family of five children. Her mother had died a few weeks back. The father had been killed in a mine. The widow had worked in the fields and simply worked herself to death. A kind-hearted neighbor, herself in abject poverty, comes in to help the children sometimes. The little mother wants one of the smallest taken care of in some institution. The Count leaves promising his aid and they look upon him as upon some magician able to transform misery into bliss.

The soldier's wife is finally located in a miserable hovel. She is there not only with her children, but with a mother-in-law as well. The woman told of their troubles. Yes, she had two sons, but they parted. Now they took the married son off and the younger woman simply can't feed the youngsters. The Count promises to see if her husband cannot be returned.

In another hovel the physician calls on a man in his death throes. Pneumonia. It is bitterly cold. There is no fire in the hut. No mattress, nor pillow for the sick man.

"We drive home in silence. At the front door

The Third Floor Tenant

By Enrico Castelnuovo (From the Italian)

The family who occupy the first floor are crabbed aristocrats with whom we barely exchange a ceremonious bow. Besides, they have a separate stairway and entrance, and often for whole weeks at a time we do not meet. But with our neighbor of the third floor it is quite otherwise. She had not yet moved into her new apartment when one day the maid came to announce that a lady was in the drawing-room and had asked for me.

May heaven pardon me, but I thought it was some agent, and reproved the girl for admitting her without asking who she was and what she wanted.

Perhaps I was wrong to speak so loudly; but the fact is that the unknown, a middle-aged woman, dressed in brown, rather plain than handsome, with a large nose and a certain rotundity of form, came to meet me in the hall, holding out her hand with singular effusion.

"Signora Serponti, you must excuse the liberty. You do not know me—"

"I have not that pleasure, but pray sit down."

"I am the new tenant, the tenant of the third floor, the widow of the lawyer Vantaggiosi," replied the lady, seating herself on the sofa.

And she continued her discourse by saying how greatly pleased she was to have come to live near such a respectable family as ours—she, a widow, alone, and needing protection and friends. The apartment in itself hardly suited her; too little light, too little air, the outlook over the rio, disagreeable exhalations at low tide; but she had decided to lease it as soon as she learned that we were on the second floor. A young married couple—

"Oh, we have been married ten years," I interrupted.

Signora Vantaggiosi clasped her hands in apparent amazement.

"Is it possible? But were you married in your cradle?"

Such foolish speeches always please one and dispose the mind to benevolence. At that moment the lady's nose no longer seemed to me too long. And I, too, murmured some affable speech, and offered my services whenever she might have need of them.

The lady was loquacious and told me her story. Previous to the lawyer Vantaggiosi she had been married to Judge Malcauti, a man who would have become one of the leading lights of the judiciary had he not died. And here the widow shed three tears, one for her first husband, one for her second, and one for the son she might have had by the memorable Vantaggiosi had she not met with a serious mishap. Then raising her moist eyes to me she asked:

"And you have no children?"

To my negative reply she added: "There is time enough, time enough; but for me—"

Then she told me of her travels. With her two husbands she had traveled over half Italy, and her last grief had befallen her at Turin. She might have remained there, where the deceased had a host of friends, but she preferred to return to her Venice, although it was sad to come back to one's native town and find none of one's family remaining.

After an hour Signora Vantaggiosi went about her own affairs, sorry not to have met my husband, who was out.

This fortune was granted her on the day on which she came to occupy her abode. Poor Signora Vantaggiosi! One should have seen her, with only an irascible old servant to help her, running up and down stairs with the men who were carrying up her furniture and quarreling among themselves. There was one moment in which her strength seemed exhausted, and she sank down on a trunk which had been left temporarily in the public hall, exclaiming: "Ah, I can do no more!"

My husband, who was just coming upstairs, and who is a most considerate man, heard the cry of distress, and introducing himself, invited her to rest in our apartment while one of our servants saw to the installation of her things.

Signora Vantaggiosi accepted the offer with enthusiasm, and then confessed that in the great confusion she had been able to eat nothing that day but a cup of coffee in the morning, so it was only courteous of us to invite her to dine with us. In truth it pleased us to see her eat with such good appetite; we felt that she was positively famished.

It must be admitted that Signora Olympia Vantaggiosi at once showed her gratitude. She did not cease to overwhelm us with flattering words. We were angels from paradise; we had understood at once the needs of such a woman as she, naturally affectionate and expansive and cruelly used by fate. Yes, she was a sworn enemy of the etiquette of ceremony; few friends, but faithful, that was what she needed. Ah, she could never thank heaven enough that she had found the third floor in our house vacant. But she did not wish to be a nuisance, no indeed; and she took her leave.

That evening I said to my husband: "I am afraid that Signora Vantaggiosi is inclined to be a meddling woman."

But Silvio interrupted me. What a hasty judgment! Here she might have remained all day, and she had gone away so as not to appear indiscreet. However, I made some inquiries. Those with whom I spoke did not know Signora Vantaggiosi personally, but knew that she was of good family and assured me that Signor Vantaggiosi had been greatly esteemed.

"You are so often alone," Silvio reassured me, "that it will not be a misfortune if our neighbor does keep you company occasionally."

Certainly it was not difficult to be friends with Signora Vantaggiosi, who fairly lavished tenderness upon us. "It is my nature," she often said; "I cannot love by halves."

After a very short time she desired that we should address each other by our first names. It was impossible to refuse; it would have grieved her terribly. We must look upon each other as sisters—I, of course, the younger sister, much younger. In confidence I may say that there is thirty years' difference in our ages.

In company the Vantaggiosi—I suppress her title of signora now, in view of our great intimacy—was talkative and not averse to joking, but if anyone congratulated her on her good humor she heaved a profound sigh and said:

"You do not see me when I am alone. Then a thousand sad thoughts assail me; then, if I were not sustained by religion, I fear I should end all by committing suicide."

In order to escape so grave a danger she soon adopted the habit of coming to see us every day with her work, after luncheon, after dinner—say nothing of the days when she was our guest and came before luncheon and before dinner. These days were to have been only Sundays and holidays, but she soon added those when her kitchen fire would not burn. No one can aspire to perfection, and our neighbor has two defects: a nose too long and a kitchen stove too prone to go out. When she appeared all forlorn, we could do no less than ask her if she had dined. As she always replied:

"I swallowed an egg; that is enough for me. Hearing this, I should have been ashamed to order another place laid at table."

"Olympia," I said one evening to my tender friend, "tomorrow a veritable artist who can do everything is coming to me. He can do anything from mending fans to fixing stoves and overhauling them. Would you like me to send him to examine your kitchen stove?"

Who would have imagined it? This innocent proposition was misinterpreted by Olympia, who detected in it an offensive allusion. And she unburdened her heart to me the next morning.

"I have not closed my eyes all night. I never would have believed that you would humiliate me so."

"But I assure you—"

"No, no, I understood very well the significance of your words. And you will excuse me if after this I do not accept your invitations."

"Nonsense," I insisted, "let us put an end to this. I repeat that what you imagine never entered my head."

She began to weep. "To have suffered so much from a sister!—for you are a sister to me—"

I began to lose patience. Fortunately at that moment my husband, who is mild as milk, came in.

"What is it? What has happened? But Signora Olympia, what ideas have you got into your head? Rather, you must stay to luncheon today!"

"I should not dream of it."

"Don't be obstinate in your refusal, or I shall be angry."

"But," murmured the Vantaggiosi, already having won, "today is a fast day, and you wicked people do not keep it."

Silvio was perplexed. "Tomorrow, then."

"No, no," replied our neighbor magnanimously, "since we must make peace let it be at once. Have you any more of that fish pickled in oil?"

"Yes, indeed."

"And that caviar?"

"That too."

"Excellent. That is more than enough for my lunch. Oh, you have bewitched me. I cannot sulk with you even for an hour." With which declaration Olympia threw herself into my arms.

An Open Letter to Miss Fitch

New York City, October 29, 1910.

Editor of Town Talk,

Dear Sir: The enclosed "open letter" to Miss Vera Fitch, the young Californian who attempted to take her life here recently and who is still lying at the Flower Hospital in this city, may perhaps serve a good purpose in opening the eyes of some of the young and ambitious poets who may be lured hither by ill-founded hopes of achieving riches and renown by literature in New York.

For certain valid reasons the letter must remain anonymous, though I trust that whatever interest and value it may possess will not be lessened on that account.

Very truly yours,

—A Californian.

So, you poor girl, you came to New York to make a living and a name for yourself in literature—in poetry—of all things! You left your beautiful native State of California, gave up your home and friends and came to beard the lions of this brutal metropolis with a few frail songs in your hand and a great hope in your heart. Then, because this monster of a city would not listen, and those in its service had no ears for singing, you naturally despaired after many cruel buffets. And now you are lying on a hospital bed with a small but very wicked bullet in your lovely body—and wake to find yourself quite strangely famous in a night!

When I heard of your rash deed, a great sorrow possessed me. For first you are a poet, and too, am a poet, and know and have felt the great griefs of poets. Then you are a Californian, native daughter of my own State, and that is ways a bond between us Western people. Moreover you are young and beautiful, and, it is said, gifted, and surely we always feel a deeper yearning when youth, beauty and talent go down, or are given down, to death.

If I may be forgiven this open letter to you for the equally open motive which inspires it, if I may address you as a fellow-poet, a fellow-Californian, and I might even say, a fellow-sufferer, what I am going to say, even though it does not profit you yourself, my poor, disillusioned sister, it is possible that some one else may nevertheless be helped by it. Now that the bullet missed that aching heart of yours, and you have awakened again to the daylight, and find yourself and your sorrows suddenly on every tongue, you may well ask: "Why am I now worth so much attention?" Yes, why should your little pistol bring you fame when your pen could not? Is blood then so much more eloquent than ink? Does a pistol-shot ring farther than a poem? There are enough young women, and qualified with prettiness, too, who have laid hands on themselves and aroused no particular interest.

But you, Miss Fitch, are just such a romantic victim as this unromantic Moloch of a city loves—to chew. You have brought it blood, and there is nothing it loves more than blood, unless it be beauty. But not the beauty you sought to give it!—the beauty of thought, sentiment and aspiration. No. The Beauty it craves is only of the body, as you yourself had grown to learn—to your horror and disgust. It buys the beauty of women and the brains of men, and corrupts both. You certainly do not know the monster as I know it, if you think it has any use for the beauty of poets or the brains of poets. The lusts and idols of its cold heart are centered right there where you sought to rid yourself forever from its rolling eyes and leering face—on the Great White Way—which is not great, nor white, nor a way, but simply a labyrinth for vices and luxuries to sport in. The woman who would be rich, "famous," and successful, will find a market-place there for such gifts as a pleasing face or a shapely figure. But there is no market-place for poetry—not here, not in all the land.

That, too, you learned in good time, when your pathetic little manuscripts came back, and no one would buy your sweet, inspired songs. And the better your poetry, the less would the magazines desire it! How strange that you should think editors and publishers really desired poetry! But, of course, you had heard this place spoken of as a "literary center"—God save the adjective! Here and there, to be sure, a man makes a living at verse (which to most persons is the same as poetry) but it is only by playing the clown in the low-grade weeklies. Yet there are many good poets (and many bad ones, encouraged to their undoing by ignorant or dishonest friends), yes, many good poets who send excellent work to the magazines. There are so many, in fact, that it is quite possible that editors do not always lie when they say "we are overstocked with verse." Then the verse may not always be of just the right length to fit in at the tail-end of a page, or it may conflict with what they call, very quaintly, their "policies."

Poetry in New York! In California it is, in a way, part of our life, with the sunshine and flowers, but you might as well expect orchids to grow on the walls of the sky scrapers as hope to find a soil for poetry in sterile and soulless Manhattan. As for the magazines—well, I have various good friends among the editors—good business fellows they—and I have grown wise enough to be discreet, but if you fancy that they deal in literature—go study the nickelodeon and the vaudeville show. You see, their purpose is no longer to entertain but merely to amuse. Of course, they may some day realize their error and find that they have been terribly derelict in their duty to the soul of the nation—and the souls of its poets.

I know about this thing, my dear sister-in-song. I could tell you much more, but that might not be well for you just now. Some of us poets (who live by prose) have not quite succumbed to the monster; we have learned to fight the devil with fire. We have grown very sinewy and tough in our tussles with him, and he a little less sure of downing us. Our patience and hope and defiance is beautiful, firm and grim! We are also very fastidious as to what kind of "success" is offered us. We know the taste of the iron, and we have digested it. It is really a better medicine than lead, even though it does go to the heart. Yes, our heads, though "bloody," are still unbowed.

Your head, too, remained unbowed, and true to your ideals, dear Vera Fitch. Believe me, it was not you that were defeated, but rather this Babylonian town. Now, no doubt, it will fawn upon you—as is the habit of the monster when one does not succumb to its lusts. You will live to be glad that you did not succumb to it—nor to Death. For many, many worse things might have befallen you than that you should now be lying in a hospital with that very wicked, but very instructive bullet in your most beautiful body.

—A Californian.

German Women and the Emperor

The passage in his now famous Koenigsberg speech in which the Emperor William admonished German women to devote themselves to "the quiet work of the home," rather than to "the attainment of supposed rights," has engaged a good deal of the attention of the League of Associations of German Women, which has just held its annual conference at Heidelberg. Various speakers have criticised his Majesty's utterance, and at a recent general meeting of the league a strongly worded resolution was adopted without debate. The league claims to represent thousands of German women and the resolution was supported by all the associations except the German Evangelical League. The resolution expresses pain and regret at the emperor's misunderstanding of the causes of the women's movement and of its aims. After a profession of patriotism and unselfishness the resolution concludes: "We do not fail to appreciate the importance of woman's domestic duties, but we see that in the modern conditions of life which drive 9,500,000 women into the struggle for a living outside the home, it is absolutely necessary to go beyond the bounds of domestic duty. We regret, therefore, most deeply that our efforts to fit women better than heretofore for modern conditions of life have, by this imperial criticism, been brought into discredit among the unthinking and unreasonable."

Doctored News from Portugal

From the London newspapers it is apparent that no deliance should be placed in the despatches which were sent out from Lisbon during the first few days after the revolution. It develops that the revolutionists took possession of the telegraph wires and concocted news to suit their own purposes. Among other things they declared that the Spanish Minister had taken part in their councils immediately after the republic was declared, thereby committing his country to the revolution. This turns out to have been a pure fake designed to hasten recognition from foreign powers. Equally false were the stories about members of religious orders fighting side by side with the royalists against the republicans. The truth about the revolution is slowly filtering through and those who placed confidence in the first stories published are now trying to reconstruct their ideas of the whole affair.

A Merciful Deliverance

Thank heavens! the campaign is over at last and we can celebrate Thanksgiving in the proper spirit of gratitude. Of all the merciful deliverances that came this week, not the least is our deliverance from language like this in the papers:

"A rather disreputable paper which enjoys its gutter-snipe sort of life in stirring up strife between its companions of the sewer and those who would be clean is a warm and frouzy advocate of the election of—" and so on.

This happens to be from a Portland paper, but it might well have been from any one of fifty along the coast. When will we outgrow our border journalism?

Kent's Explanation

William Kent, congressman-elect for the second district, was charged during his canvass of Sacramento with employing Chinese servants and publicly replied to the charge, according to the Sacramento Union, as follows:

"Well, yes, I do employ three Chinamen as servants at my home. They are good servants, but neither myself nor my father would have employed them to do this or any other work, had it not been that there was an exclusion law against Asiatics on our statute books. If I could find white men who would work for the wages I pay these Chinese, and they could do the work, why, I'd rather have white men."

Which seems to indicate that as an explainer for political purposes Kent is not wholly felicitous. He may learn adroitness in Washington.

Versatile Reformers

From the Santa Cruz Sentinel I learn that the city of the roaring surf has a woman's club called the Saturday Afternoon which has taken up the work of reforming all existing evils. Among other improvements which these good women will clamor for is an increase in the number of hitching posts. In the moral way they will investigate the moving picture shows to make sure that the blush of shame is not brought to the modest damask cheek of youth. And they agitate for lower steps on street cars. No doubt this too is a moral reform. The good work of the Saturday Afternoon Club, I take it, is a pernicious influence in the exposure of female hoisery that so often occurs when the dear lady gets on or off a car. In San Francisco such agitation would be met with resolute opposition on the part of the men.

A Militant Daily

A wonderfully aggressive fighting paper is the San Jose Mercury, the organ of the H. B. Brothers, "Red" and "Black." Despite the fact that "Red" Hayes ran for Congress on precisely the same platform as that on which Hiram Johnson ran for governor, the San Jose Mercury did not lose its equanimity in supporting gubernatorial candidate. On the day before election the Mercury in its leading editorial was indignant over the awful political condition in Pennsylvania and its only other editorial was a colorless screed on "evening education." It had to search the Mercury carefully to find reference to Hiram Johnson. A militant paper indeed is this organ of "Rouge et Noir."

The Spectator

Dr. Brown of Oakland

The Rev. C. R. Brown of Oakland appears to be convalescent. Two weeks ago we were told that this popular preacher was suffering from a nervous break-down which necessitated his immediate withdrawal from the pulpit of the First Congregational Church and the cessation of his spiritual labors; but now we learn that he intends to stay with his flock till the first Sunday in December and take an active part in a big jubilee celebration. Also comes the information from Oakland that after severing his connection with the church Dr. Brown instead of going to a sanitarium will proceed to New York in quest of a new minister for Oakland and to look over the several fields of Christian endeavor from which Macedonian cries have come all the way to California. So evidently Dr. Brown's nerves are not so badly frazzled as the good people of Oakland were led to believe by the announcement that he had become too weak to bear the great burden which his multifarious duties imposed.

Reticence and Suppression

Unfortunately the longer Dr. Brown remains in Oakland the wider spread becomes unpleasant gossip about the sudden turn in his affairs. Some days ago the Chronicle intimated that there was a good deal of reticence in Oakland regarding Dr. Brown's resignation. Persons to whom inquiries were made, according to the Chronicle, were not disposed to talk freely. The truth of the matter is that as a good deal of effort has been made to discourage discussion of the subject it has come to wear an air of mystery, a circumstance that only serves to heighten curiosity and provoke speculation. As the matter now stands Dr. Brown appears to have resigned from his pulpit under something in the nature of a cloud, and the trustees, laboring under the delusion that what the newspapers can be induced to suppress sinks into the limbo of forgotten things are being criticised for thickening instead of dispelling it. Dr. Brown himself increased the awkwardness of the situation by explaining in the public prints that he had not resigned on account of any friction between himself and any member of his congregation. There is nothing so important to a minister of the gospel as the confidence of the people, and as Dr. Brown intends to continue the diffusion of his spiritual graces in his chosen career it is too bad that there should be any scepticism regarding the cause of his resignation. This scepticism might be allayed if the ministers of Oakland were to follow their usual custom of attesting their deep regret at Oakland's loss by resolutions abounding in appropriate sentiment. So far, despite the great prestige enjoyed by Dr. Brown, they have been singularly inert, and ministers on this side of the bay have done nothing but endeavor to hush up the gossip.

The Busy Judge

Judge Lawlor, I am told, occasioned a great deal of dissatisfaction among his cronies of the Bulletin-Spreckels sanhedrim last week, when, believing that sentiment was turning against Hiram Johnson he began identifying himself with the opposition and went so far as to sit on the platform at one of Bell's meetings in Oakland. Prior to that time Judge Lawlor devoted all his energies to Republican politics. He figured that he was assured of the normal Democratic vote and that with the vote of the old fanatical adherents of the graft prosecution he would be an easy winner, and so he campaigned chiefly in the role of reformer. For awhile he appealed to church-goers, but being a Catholic he did not think it necessary to go among people of his faith, and so he loomed up at a meeting of Methodist ministers in the South and behaved like a Belfast Irishman. In Fresno he attended a Johnson meeting with Chester Rowell as sponsor, and for awhile it seemed as though they were gathering in all ends. Then came the report that Bell sentiment was growing, whereupon the little judge rushed up to Democratic headquarters and demanded to know why not receiving the support of the organization. Promptly came the answer: "Because you're not sporting the head of the ticket." Resolution for Spellacy

Doubt whether Tim Spellacy if defeated will n very long, for Tim has plenty of consol- in store for him. If I am not mistaken he e the verge of cleaning up a cool million or so l. Spellacy has for years been known as a rnsfield oil man, but it is only recently that il lands have fulfilled the promise which he rts held out when he acquired them. I am that within a few months Spellacy will turn of his holdings into money in such a sum he will probably disdain politics ever after- s except as a gentleman's recreation. I y of no candidate who was more popular with newspapermen during the recent campaign Spellacy. He was always in good spirits always ready for a joke, though his sense of or is not as highly developed as it should n one of Hibernian extraction. The repre- tives of the local papers who accompanied and Spellacy on their tour of the State pre- l the two candidates into Jackson, Amador ty, where Senator Caminetti had arranged a big meeting, gathering in his Italian sup- rs from all the countryside. Spellacy asked eporters to reserve a room for him at the son Hotel, so C. A. Farnsworth of the Call egered him as "Timotio Spellacio" and the an clerk reserved for Tim the best room in ouse.

Jealousy of Mr. Hackett

erman Hackett is the leading man of the any which presented Clyde Fitch's last play, "City," at the Savoy Theater, but Geoffrey in the role of the dope fiend achieved the f the production. Whenever there was ap- e for Hackett there was a great deal more ein and this fact so worked on the feelings Hackett that he treated the public to an ex- on of his jealousy last Friday night. After ig scene in the second act there were many in calls which Hackett accepted with com- ncy, but the audience wanted Stein and per- d in their applause until he was allowed to ar alone and make a speech. In the midst is speech the audience was amazed to see Hackett bob out and make profound obeisance. rst nobody knew just what had caused Hackett's unconventional action but remembering the difficulty which they had experienced in getting Stein alone before the footlights, they understood and a chill went over the house. Gossip will out and it was whispered afterwards that Hackett's feelings were so overwrought by Stein's success that he would have come to blows with the char- acter actor one night had not others behind the scenes interfered. When jealousy interferes with art temperament is apt to degenerate into tem- per.

How Billy Got the Better of Ned

It is a long time since I have had occasion to chronicle the doings of the fearsome warriors who make wine flow like gore in the intermit- tent Battle of Fizz Water. Things seem to have been dull with the wine agents, or at any rate, they have not been happy in achieving coups worthy of preservation in print. But with the opening of the winter season things began to look up. The wine agents got busy. Always the engrossing subject of study with those of the wine agents who have good social connections is, how to substitute their vintages for Mums at the Greenway balls. This is not child's play and the trick has never been turned. Now as in the yesteryears the corks that pop at the Green- way supper tables are stamped with the label of Greenway's house. But Billy O'Connor who makes life worth living by selling Clicquot, evolved a plan to circumvent Ned and put it in operation on the afternoon of Greenway's birth- day party. Billy knows by heart all the names of all the beaux who are entitled to invitations to a Greenway party. He can call them by their first names and find them in their favorite haunts without difficulty. So on that auspicious day he started out bright and early to meet them by ones and twos and threes. And he was very cor- dial. Nothing would do but that each and every- one of them should crack a pint of Clicquot with him and then another pint and so on ad lib. The result was that when the hour of dinner arrived the Greenway beaux did not dare to change their vintage and drank nothing but Clic- quot. During the dance they moistened their lips with Clicquot and even at supper they asked for Billy's wine. It was a great day for Ned Greenway but it was a profitable one for Billy O'Connor.

Billy Erb's Distinction

It is not given to all men to be distinguished in the same way. If it were, what an intolerably monotonous old world this would be! Out of the diversity of men's distinctions springs that zest which keen-edges our appetite for life. But I am getting away from my point. I was going to illustrate it by saying that Cyril Tobin, for instance, is distinguished as the man who knocked down Walter McCreery, whereas Clare Payne is distinguished as the man who was knocked down by Maurice Shortridge. Joe Eastland is distinguished because he cabled to our papers denials of an engagement about which he could be supposed to have only telepathic information, while Emile Bruguiere is distinguished because when the cable sizzled with the news of his Parisian complication, he didn't cable at all. Walter Martin is distinguished as the man who was put off a train because he wouldn't pay unless he received a seat, while Downey Harvey is dis- tinguished for having lost a train (and a road- bed) because he couldn't pay for it. And so on through the list. There was a time when to have one's appendix removed was a distinction. You remember how the distinguished sufferers were gathered at a dinner in the Rosenstirn home? Then came a time when it was a dis- tinction not to have one's appendix removed. And now Billy Erb has capped the climax with a new distinction. This popular athlete and oil man has just had his appendix removed and Dr. Wal- ler who performed the operation declares that it is the biggest appendix ever removed in San Francisco. As every man is proud of his particu- lar claim to distinction, Billy Erb not infre- quently boasts about the pathological fame which has come to him.

He Worked Little Children

Canning decomposed vegetable matter is not the only technical violation of the law that has been charged against the California Fruit Can- ners' Association of late. I have learned that about the time that Charley Bentley was explain- ing through the newspapers the difficulty of keep- ing the molding berry out of jam the superin- tendent of his plant in San Leandro was defend- ing himself before a jury on a charge of violating the child-labor law. So it appears that Mr. Bent- ley has been doing business under considerable difficulty of late. While Uncle Sam has been im- pugning the virtue of his jams State Labor Com- missioner Mackenzie has been depriving him of the services of industrious little tots through whom he was able to keep down the cost of production. About a dozen of them were turned into the fresh air and green fields, and merely by way of admonition the superintendent of the plant was arrested on only one charge. He demanded a jury trial, and by his peers he was found guilty. Of course, as a result, the Bentley pay-roll will go up, but it may turn out that Commissioner Mackenzie has done our distinguished fellow-citizen a great service, for perhaps there will be fewer moldy berries in the jam now that maturer intellects are employed to guard against them. It is to be hoped that the vigilance of Uncle Sam and Commissioner Mackenzie will bear such good fruit that in time Mr. Bentley's jams will be all that J. Caesar insisted that his wife ought to be.

They Are Close Friends

Much political capital was made by the opponents of Bell out of the meeting which took place one day between Earl Rogers of Los Angeles and Frank Hering, the young college teacher from Indiana. All sorts of plots and dire intrigues were imagined to damn the Democratic candidate because his principal speaker had dared to converse with Rogers. As a matter of fact Rogers and Hering have been life-long friends and while Hering was on the stump here Mrs. Frank Hering and Mrs. Earl Rogers were together in Chicago.

They Bet Against Their Paper

One of the anomalies of the campaign was the stand taken by John D. Spreckels and his son Jack. The Call of which John D. is the proprietor, supported Hiram Johnson for governor, but the Johnson cause did not engage the sympathies of either John D. or his son. Both were ardent boosters for Bell and expressed great confidence by large bets made through a young man who is very friendly with Jack Spreckels. So we were treated to the curious situation of the Call doing everything in its power to make the proprietor of the Call as well as the son of the proprietor, lose money. And the Call accomplished its purpose. I wonder how the two Spreckels's feel about the matter.

The Call's Circulation

Aside from any mere political considerations there was a very valid reason for the support which the Call gave to Hiram Johnson. During the primary campaign, it will be remembered, the Call supported Charles F. Curry, not in outspoken editorials, it is true, but with all its might, just the same. The advocacy of Curry's candidacy lost the Call a great number of subscribers and it was only when the paper entered vigorously into the Johnson fight that it recovered what it had dropped. According as the pendulum of circulation swings, so swings the mighty engine of public opinion.

An Election Mot by Gavin

Gavin McNab, the only leader who seems equal to the task of electing Democrats in this city, was not for Bell. Very adroitly McNab induced Bell to take the stump for Leland against McCarthy during the last municipal election and that maneuver lost Bell whatever hold he had on the organized union labor vote. If the McCarthyites had not been smarting from Bell's oratorical lash they would have voted for him this time instead of for Stitt Wilson and Johnson's small plurality here would have been overturned. McNab knows this better than anybody else and McNab's stand in the recent campaign was made known to the State when his lieutenant Frank Gould declared publicly for Johnson. So it was interesting to hear what McNab had to say about the outcome. Meeting him on election night I asked him about it and he said: "The good news from the East will stay the flowing of the blood from our wound."

Getting Ready for the Rush

The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway contracted the other day for one million dollars' worth of cars with which to handle western traffic. This means that the officials of this corporation are looking forward to prodigious development of western territory in the near future. And as a rule railroad officials are not visionary or ultra-optimistic. They keep in pretty close touch with the centres of industry, and it is their business to anticipate the fluctuations of trade. I was talking to an official of the Santa Fe the other day who told me that all signs indicated an unprecedented development of the industries of the Pacific Coast. "Though a third trans-continental road is now in the field," he said, "each of them will do far more business than was formerly done by either the Southern Pacific or the Santa Fe." Incidentally he took occasion to inform me that the Santa Fe is steadily adhering to its old policy of putting its earnings heavily into improvements and avoiding all temptation to enter the speculative field. "Our company," he said, "has demonstrated that it pays to treat the public right. So far as its bonds have gone to its stockholders, these bonds have brought very nearly the highest market price instead of being divided at rates far below the market quotation."

Mr. Withey Was Sore

Mr. F. N. Withey, the impresario who presented the Countess de Swirsky in interpretive dances supplied the principal amusement of the performance last Friday evening by making a speech which was not billed in the program. Mr. Withey, it seems, had been thrown into peevish humor by the criticisms of two of dramatic critics who witnessed his dancer the evening before and being a newcomer in the field of theatrical management he made the mistake of appealing to the sympathy of his audience. For the two critics who had treated Russian dancer with more or less levity he used words of sarcasm that were meant to wither only provoked laughter; while of the critic who had commended her efforts he was fulsome and laudatory, extending his praise to the critic's newspaper which he characterized as one of the great world-papers. He begged the audience to forget what they had read in the more or less complimentary reviews and to pass individual opinion upon his offering. This was a reasonable but quite superfluous request and the audience did not take it seriously. In fact a good many of his hearers snickered. They snickered.

all more when he went on to express his own opinion of the Countess de Swirsky. Mr. Withey used superlative terms in estimating her artistic worth, but just why he did this, unless expected the audience to forget his previous function and inconsistently accept his individual opinion, it would be difficult to explain. It was quite plain that Mr. Withey was sore and the audience was amused. With a little more experience as an impresario Mr. Withey will learn how to conceal his soreness at the critics and he will get along much better with audiences by the simple expedient of refraining from calling himself to their personal attention. The impresario should be felt but not seen or heard.

She Really a Russian Noble?

I believe that the "Countess" de Swirsky admitted to one of her interviewers that she was not really a countess, but only a viscountess, the higher title belonging to her mother. But as a matter of fact, has this barefooted dancer the right to any title of nobility at all? I am moved to ask this question by the following which appeared recently in a New York paper: "There were some former visitors to Paris who remember Tamara de Swirsky without the attractive prefix 'Countess.' They say that when the young lady lived in Paris, on the Boulevard Haussmann, her mother, it is true, had a title, but it was 'Docteur en Medecine,' and on the brass front-door plate it followed the name of Zenaide de Podwissotzki as Tamara's mother was called before her second marriage.' It is interesting in this connection to note that the dancer was received in this city by the Russian Consul. The "Countess" has treated us in public print to her amusing adventures with Mr. John Jacob Astor who, she would have us understand, was madly infatuated with her. But I have seen other accounts of the dancer's doings at Newport. For instance, to quote the same paper again: "Some of the New York daily newspapers must be hard pressed, indeed, for society news when they permit a fake Countess of the Broadway stage to work them for column and even page stories on her views of Newport society. * * * * The actress in question, who performed once or twice at Newport, did not have the pleasure of meeting anyone there worth knowing, for the reason that she could not say ten words without butchering the King's English, and for the additional most interesting reason that the scheme she tried on the piazza of her boarding-house to have herself photographed with a certain multi-millionaire did not go through, and proved to be a sort of boomerang in her efforts later to secure private engagements along the Avenue." It is a long way from Newport to San Francisco, but things of this sort travel with relentless speed to undo the imaginings of the press agent.

The Vaughan-Lytell Marriage

So Evelyn Vaughan and Bertram Lytell, erstwhile beloved of the matinee throngs at the Alcazar, are really and truly married! For a long time it has been suspected, but nobody had the proof until Frank Bacon told about meeting the bride and groom in Louisville. Bacon says they have their own company and are producing a number of the attractions in which they appeared at the Alcazar. Here is the story he tells about their marriage: "I don't know whether you ever heard just how that bridal affair was pulled off. No? At the end of the season she was supposed to take a vacation to the mountains. Only she didn't. She slipped off East and married Bert. And then when Florence Roberts was taken ill she came back on a hurry call and never told a soul. I suppose you could call that a runaway marriage, right enough."

Dress at the Greenway

The debutantes came in for most of the attention at the first Greenway last Friday night, which by the way assembled the most elaborate collection of gowns ever seen in San Francisco. Miss Lee Girvin and Miss Gertrude Thomas shared the honors for beauty while Miss Constance McLaren and Miss Ysobel Chase appeared to win in the popular class. All four of the girls wore white chiffon embroidered in silver beads. The two Otis girls who were among the prettiest of the debutantes, varied the monotony by wearing colors. Miss Cora wore a striking shade of French blue chiffon which was most effective over rose pink satin. Her sister Fredericka wore pink chiffon embroidered in silver. Mrs. William H. Crocker was one of the most handsomely gowned of the matrons. Over a skirt of silver lace she wore an overdress of old rose satin embroidered in silver, with a number of diamond ornaments.

It Was a Clothes Show

For a clothes show the Pomeroy wedding on Thursday was a close second to the assembly. Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt Jr. was one of the prettiest young matrons present. Her dreamy and soft brown eyes and hair were admirably set off by her costume of brown velvet. The coat was made with a broad collar of white satin and her hat was covered with plumes of a deep orange shade. With this striking combination, Mrs. Roosevelt carried a huge muff of yellow fox. Miss Marian Newhall looked unusually handsome in old rose satin with white fox furs and a small crush hat of rose velvet. Miss Helene Irwin who is the best gowned of the younger girls wore instead of her favorite rose color an especially pretty frock of dull blue chiffon made over white satin, and a large black picture hat. The bride's gown was an unusually graceful princess effect of white satin embroidered in pearls and tiny gold beads but she looked even more charming in her going away costume of brown velvet with a small brown hat trimmed with pink plumes.

Enid Gregg's Admirers

Enid Gregg was undoubtedly the hit of the Kirmess. Her light feather-like grace recalled Genée to those who had seen the famous Swedish dancer in London or New York. There isn't the least question that Miss Gregg could command a high salary on the stage any day. She is a born dancer with a sense of rhythm that is rare and a magnetic personality. The Greggs are an interesting family. Miss Ethel bids fair to rival her fascinating sister in popularity. Mrs. Gregg is as youthful appearing as her daughter. For a girl who is still under twenty Miss Enid has had much masculine attention. Her latest admirer is Lieutenant Laurence Barrett of Mare Island who is named for the famous actor and is one of the cleverest young officers in the service. He and Miss Gregg met at the masquerade at Mare Island a few weeks ago and since then Lieutenant Barrett has made frequent trips to town. There is another devoted man in New York who has been sending Miss Gregg daily telegrams to keep himself in mind and who wired an order to a local florist to send her a fresh orchid every morning. And these are only two.

The Scold at the Bridge Table

To spend an afternoon watching a ladies' bridge club in session is to be enlightened on some unpleasant phases of human nature. Animosity flares forth and on many occasions there seems to be no effort made to restrain them. Tempers are frequently cultivated rather than controlled and many a matron goes home after an unsuccessful game with an empty purse and a peevish disposition. I have in mind a recent incident. A well known matron who is the daughter of a deceased railroadman grew furious at the pretty daughter of a prominent judge who made a misplay. She uncorked the vials of her wrath and poured a stream of scalding language over the poor girl who was so startled by the outburst that she hadn't a word to say in reply. The other women at the table tried to stop the flow of voluble abuse but the matron kept on expressing her mind until she was exhausted. The younger woman left the table in hysterics.

A Romantic Wedding

An old-fashioned romance culminated in the marriage of Miss Gertrude Perry and William E. Dassonville which last week surprised society. The first intimation of it was the marriage announcement in the newspapers Monday morning. Mr. Dassonville and Miss Perry were drawn together by a mutual interest in camera art. Miss Perry who spent last summer in Yosemite with her friend Miss Julia Walcott Thomas, has always been interested in amateur photography, and in the valley took a number of views which she sent to a friend in San Francisco with the request that they be shown to the photographer for criticism. Dassonville praised the pictures highly and wanted to see more of Miss Perry's work. A vicarious correspondence was carried on for a few weeks and when Miss Perry returned to town she called at the studio with her friend, and arranged to take lessons in methods of finishing. After a few lessons the interest in photography developed an interest of a deeper character and the romance had begun. Miss Perry was popular in the gayeties of the young set while Mr. Dassonville was entirely unknown to society so her friends learned nothing of the affair. Friday the bride came over from her home in Ross Valley to attend the Greenway assembly and spent the night in town with friends. The following morning she visited the studio where the young photographer persuaded her to be married that afternoon. Dr. and Mr. Perry were summoned from Ross Valley and wedding was hastily arranged at the Swedenborgian Church. When it was over the bride telephoned to two of her intimate friends who had not known that an engagement existed, and the next day society discussed the latest surprise wedding.

What Bobbie Ross Loses

As a result of his ridiculous infatuation for Lucy Banning-Bradbury-Greenleaf, Bobbie Ross the son of United States Circuit Judge Erskin Ross, bids fair to lose a pretty penny of property. I do not know whether Judge Ross has really announced his intention of disinheriting Bobbie as the despatches from Los Angeles stated, but I am told that the youngster's scandalous conduct duct has alienated his mother and that she is not likely to leave him anything after his escape. When Judge Ross married he had a good deal of valuable property but it was nearly all unimproved. His wife was Madame Ida Hancock, the owner of the celebrated Rancho La Brea, on which have recently been discovered the asphaltum deposits that have yielded so many fossil remains and that inspired Charles K. Field with one of the most effective episodes of his Bohemian Grove play, "The Cave Man." Mrs. Ross' oil lands yield her annual royalties of $100,000 and she has the largest income of any woman in Los Angeles. She had by her first marriage a son who is now married and who, unlike Bobbie, is a very proper young man. Mrs. Ross is a very shrewd woman who manages her properties with unusual skill. Her one failing is art and it is whispered in the southland that unscrupulous dealers have unloaded upon her thousands of dollars worth of junk in the shape of pseudo-antiques. Bobbie may not regret the pictures and statues and the articles of vertu he has left behind, but the day will come when he will wish he hadn't cut himself off from his inheritance. The modern Antony who gives up the world for a Cleopatra usually repents his hot-blooded impetuosity.

The Latest in Wedding Breakfasts

I have just received the following note: Dear Tantalus—The writer, recently returned from England, was much interested when attending the two most prominent weddings of the season to notice the new rules which govern the wedding breakfast. Many small tables were placed in the different rooms and hall, and these were occupied by the ladies, while the men stood. The hot dish was in a blazer on each small table, and one of the ladies served it to others at the table and the gentlemen in attendance. The abolition of champagne was noticeable, and in its place a claret cup was served. One of the greatest entertainers in London told me that champagne had been relegated except at formal dinners.

The Walker Imbrolio

The mysterious disappearance of Mrs. Althea Walker, Clarence Walker and Mrs. Margaret Walker Smoot from Salt Lake has called general attention to the proceedings in the contest of the will of the late David F. late millionaire. In her earlier days in Salt Lake Mrs. Walker was a spiritualist and with the aid of her mother conducted seances in an old adobe building downtown. The story runs that Althea's mother got it from the stars and from her confidential spirits that it would be mutually advantageous if a marriage were arranged between Walker and her daughter. Having great respect for extra-terrestrial counsels Walker made the marriage, though it was stubbornly opposed by the children of his first wife who was a very estimable woman. After the feud had developed great bitterness Walker, at the instigation of his wife, moved to this State and became considerably estranged from his children. Later on he returned to Salt Lake and took up the management of his extensive business interests there. It is said that Mrs. Walker has a large private fortune and will not want, even if she does not succeed in preventing her step-children from participating in their inheritance. The denouement of the affair is being awaited with curiosity.

An Interesting Art Exhibit

It is too bad that Hugu V. Pedersen chose the week which brought the distractions of an election and a kirmess for his exhibition of pictures at the St. Francis. Rightly to appraise the work of a painter one's mind should be free from all other exciting influences and it is undeniable that our lovers of art have hardly achieved this detached attitude during the week just closing. Nevertheless there have been large crowds resorting to the tapestry room for the study of this extremely interesting collection. Pedersen has never given an exhibition before and his work has been more or less in controversy among artists and art lovers. The cumulative effect of his canvasses has been reassuring. There can be no doubt henceforward as to his versatility, for his pictures cover a wide range of subjects variously treated. His technical manipulation is not uniformly happy, but the average is high and there are some pictures which command careful attention. The general verdict seems to center on the portrait of a ballet girl as his most felicitous composition and his moonlight study of the Taj Mahal won a great deal of praise. Decidedly it is an exhibition worth while.

Miss Haber's Evening at the St. Francis

Miss Eleanor Haber, a San Francisco girl who has achieved distinction in many parts of the country by her impersonations, imitations and monologues, will give an entertainment in the Colonial concert room of the St. Francis next Wednesday evening, November 16. Miss Haber is a charming young woman with a splendid stage presence and is possessed of unusual dramatic power which lends itself equally to serious and comic efforts. She has been heard in the homes of many of our most discriminating families and no doubt this opportunity to enjoy her work once more will be eagerly hailed. Her program will include the recitation of Browning's "Pied Piper," the scene between Jean Valjean and the Bishop from "Les Miserables," some of the French Canadian poems of Henry William Drummond and other numbers equally attractive.

The New Bohemian Club

The new Bohemian Club which will be formally opened tonight, is a great disappointment to the members. It is a large barnlike structure with a row of little green trees around the second story. They probably mean something in the scheme of architectural decoration, but it isn't quite clear what. The bar is the most harmonious and successful apartment in the building. It is a square room of good proportions finished entirely in Circassian walnut, with wide panels of gold in the ceiling. The famous red room has been repeated but without much success. The crimson walls are about all that suggest the old red room of the club in Post street. Peter Robertson's jinks play to be given tonight will be largely a resume of past glories.

Nazimova in Ibsen

By Theodore Bonnet

When one's first opportunity to judge of the art of Mme. Nazimova is through the medium of Ibsen's "Little Eyolf" one ought not to permit his impressions to produce cocksureness of judgment. Especially are these first impressions to be guarded against if one having seen no other actress in the role of Mrs. Rita Allmers is consequently unlearned in its potentialities and unable to make comparisons. For "Little Eyolf" is not a drama that affords great scope for the display either of imagination or mimetic ability. It is a play of atmosphere that makes an audience receptive by the subtle suggestion of theatrical circumstance such as the ringing of a bell, the hoarse-cries of people at a distance and the manipulation of lights. There is no great range of emotion in this play. The depths of but few passions are sounded, the psychology is circumscribed, and the protagonists are passive rather than active. The fact is that Ibsen is far from at his best as a dramatist in this play. If the Norwegian had never risen to greater heights then indeed would a taste for Ibsen be nothing more than an affectation. Here we have him distinctly as a philosopher with poetic temperament exploiting through the medium of a drama one of his dry-as-dust theories of life. And as usual he approaches life through one of its isolated weaknesses, the result being a drama lacking in the highest essential of true art—universality. Ibsen's notion was that to make us understand what we ought to be he must first make us appreciate what we are. To accomplish this purpose he described many phases of life, none of which can ever be understood by the general because each is peculiar to persons of eccentric character. A dramatist cannot devote himself to a higher mission than that of arousing the general conscience to a sense of monstrous wrong, but the monstrous wrongs that Ibsen would remedy were of an abnormal character. A vivisectionist with a microscopic eye for unclassified germs, he would have us pause in the merriment of existence to study certain horrifying phases of life; but they are not worth studying because to the average man they are exceptional and to the average woman they are almost unintelligible. The consequence is that Ibsen's value is not to be judged by the material in which he worked but by the method in which he handled it; not by his substance but by his manner. He is the Baudelaire of the drama. "Little Eyolf" is a typical specimen of Ibsen's luxuriant out morbid imagination. His purpose in this play, we are told, is to draw attention to the radical change that takes place in human life, the development as it were of character, and to show us how we may be purified by tragedy. So as usual he introduces us to some very odd and some very repulsive people. We meet a wife and mother in whom the maternal instinct is subordinate to the sexual, or rather, in whom there is no maternal instinct; for though she has a child, a helpless youngster who was crippled at a time when he was neglected because of his parents' preoccupation with their lust, she has not even sufficient womanly feeling to experience remorse; her whole thought is of her husband, her only passion that of which he is the object. Not a very agreeable person, this, to think about, much less to interest oneself in. For a husband she has the familiar Ibsen egoist, an idealist, self-centred, eager for glorious achievement, and consequently insensible to his wife's passion. The mountain peaks for him with their delicious solitudes, and when he returns home after a long absence his wife's subtle bids for his caresses are in vain. The champagne that she sets out for him to induce the mood propitious he doesn't even taste. His thoughts are of the book that he is writing on "Human Responsibility," but which eventually he abandons to score a triumph in the rearing of his son. He resolves to make of him a perfect man. This resolution he thinks is inspired by parental affection, but it is only an expression of his egotism. Presently enters into the home of this mismatched pair, the Rat-Wife, that weird, mysterious messenger who in divers guises enters into the lives of so many of Ibsen's puppets. In this instance the messenger is a combination of the Pied-Piper and Meg Merrilies, an allegorical figure, the wise critics tell us, symbolizing Death; but according to the high-brows, with a genius for interpretation of the cryptic, she is an impersonation of the psychological moment. To me she is nothing more than a theatrical expedient like the ghost in Hamlet, or the soothsayer in Julius Caesar, and if she is symbolical of anything it is Life. Her mission is to lure away gnawing things, and she lures away little Eyolf who has been gnawing at the hearts of his parents and who must die that they may live. He follows her, and is drowned, and then comes the resurrection of Rita and Allmers; also, their purification. Each realizes the selfishness of the buried past, and at the drop of the curtain they become human and therefore agreeably commonplace for the first time in their lives. This is a careless, easy-going, sun-loving world, and such a saddening harrowing picture as the one which Ibsen presents in this play cannot prove grateful to the average theatergoer. Of course the Ibsenites insist that as a work of art it is a thing of beauty, but in my judgment it is one of the few failures to be attributed to the great Norwegian dramatist. It may be that my capacity for receiving pleasure from works of the imagination is not great enough to appreciate the excellences of "Little Eyolf." Perhaps in this play Ibsen soars beyond me. If so I am to be commiserated. I must confess that to me "Little Eyolf" does not ring true. The resurrection of Rita is too much in the nature of a miracle to be employed in a drama as the logical outcome of the conflict that went before. Rita impresses one as a woman irretrievably diseased, and it is hard to understand how she could experience anything in the nature of retribution or remorse on account of the accidental death of a child for whom she had no love and whose very existence was a bar to her happiness. Remorse is the echo of a lost virtue, and according to Ibsen Rita was only an animal, unconscious of her own abnormality. The curing of her might have been accomplished by a surgical operation, not by psychological reaction. And now as to Mme. Nazimova, perhaps I failed to appreciate her because I failed to apprehend the true spirit of the character she portrayed. This emotional Russian lady never gripped me at any stage of the play. She impressed me as being a woman with more training than temper, depending on method rather than inspiration, influenced by system rather than soul. Her mechanics were never hidden from view. There was nothing of that mystically elusive quality in her art that betokens the highest reaches of histrionic genius. Her passion was flashy, her languor unseductive, her industry prodigious. But she has a way with her quite captivating, and the exiguousness of her is worth the price of admission to a generation gone mad on the reduction of the female form divine to transparent absurdity.

stupid "Soul Kiss" here many months ago included a ballet dancer of considerable grace, but the ballerina who is appearing at the Orpheum this week has a place apart in my memory of the local stage. She is not only a consummate dancer from her toes to her finger-tips but a very beautiful young woman as well. Just how high Lydia Lopokowa ranks in St. Petersburg where the ballet is a treasured institution fostered under imperial favor, I do not know. Probably she is among the leaders. When we see Mlle. Pavlowa we will be able to make comparisons. So far I have never seen on a San Francisco stage a ballet dancer fit to be compared with her. She suggests that overworked phrase, the poetry of motion, as she glides about the stage in a moving picture that is all grace and rhythm or leaps with a swish of skirts that is like the noise of flower-laden boughs shaken by a gust of wind, into the arms of her lover. The ballet is strange to us here; we have never had the chance to familiarize ourselves with its conventions. But the Orpheum audience, usually noted for its indifference to innovations from foreign lands, cannot resist the spell of this beautiful woman. The only cause for regret is that her dance is so soon over.

Blanche Walsh at the Columbia

Blanche Walsh, in her newest dramatic sensation, "The Other Woman," will be the attraction at the Columbia Theater for two weeks commencing Monday night, November 14. Miss Walsh has been seen here during the past dozen years in a number of successes. It is announced that Playwright Kummer has provided her with the best play of her career in "The Other Woman," so a dramatic treat is to be expected. "The Other Woman" is not a problem play, as its title would indicate. It deals with a problem, nevertheless—the problem of a man's love for a woman who is not his wife. But the play itself is the development of a love story, with "the other woman" as the principal figure.

The Gadski Farewell

The farewell program to be given by Mme. Gadski at the Columbia this Sunday afternoon will be one of the most interesting and beautiful offerings of song ever presented in this city. By special request the artist has consented to sing the Song Cycle, "Der Arme Peter," by Schumann, which Dr. Wullner introduced to us. The first group of songs will consist of half a dozen Schumann gems, the second of modern works by Brahms, MacDowell, Schneider and Max Liebling and the third of two excerpts from Wagner's music drama, "Der Gotterdammerung."

Faversham at the Savoy

Mme. Nazimova will make her last appearances at the Savoy this Saturday afternoon and evening, presenting Schnitzler's "The Fairy Tale." On Sunday night the house will be dark and on Monday evening William Faversham will present "The World and His Wife." The theme of this play is gossip and the evil it often brings to the innocent. It is an adaptation of Echegaray's Spanish masterpiece, "El Gran Galeoto." Mr. Faversham brings with him the original company, including such well known artists as Julie Opp, H. Cooper Cliffe, Harry Redding and Lionel Belmore.

The Liza Lehmann Concerts

Mme. Liza Lehmann, the famous English composer and her quartet of singers from London, will give their first concert next Tuesday night at the Noverty, this event being for the members of the Pacific Music Society. There will be no seats sold to the public. The first public program will be given at the Novelty on Thursday night, November 17. On this occasion the composer's beautiful setting of the quatrains from Omar Khayam's "The Rubaiyat" will be given. This cycle consists of twenty odd numbers, quartettes, solos and duets. Another work of great interest on the program is the cycle of "Non-sense Songs" from "Alice in Wonderland." The solo numbers will be "Abou Ben Adhem," sung by Miss Palgrave-Turner, the contralto; "Pearl and Song" and Everybody's Secret" by Miss Tomlin, soprano; "Five Little Love Songs," Mr. Hubert Eisdell, tenor, and "Incident of the French Camp" by Julien Henry, baritone. The final concert will be given Sunday afternoon, November 20, at the Columbia, when the Song Cycle, "Breton Folk Songs," numbers from "The Golden Threshold" and the "Four Cautionary Tales and a Moral" will be given, in addition to interest-

"John Ganton" at the Alcazar

The Metropolitan's Russian Ballet

The Imperial Russian Ballet from the Metropolitan Opera House, headed by Mlle. Pavlova and M. Mordkin, accompanied by a complete symphony orchestra from the Metropolitan under the direction of Herr Theo. Stier, will open its engagement at the Valencia on Monday night, November 21. Manager Will Greenbaum announces that two magnificent programs have been arranged for alternate nights. Altogether there will be six evening and three matinee performances. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday nights (Thanksgiving Day) and Saturday matinees the ballet, "The Arabian Nights," arranged by M. Mordkin with music by Glazounow, Arensky, Bourgault-Decoudray and other modern composers will be given. Other numbers will be "Polish Dances" by Glinka and Glazounow, interpreted by Mlle. Bronislawa Pajitzkaia, the first solo danseuse, assisted by the principals; several solo dances and "pas-de-deux," by Pavlova and Mordkin, including the famous "Bacchanale" of Glazounow and several divertissements.

The Next Orpheum Bill

George Beban will appear in a playlet called "The Sign of the Rose" at the Orpheum next week. Alf Grant and Ethel Hoag will reappear after an absence of several years. Their act is called "Something Doing All the Time" and is a collection of witty sayings and popular songs. Jewell's Manikins will be seen in a review entitled "Toyland Vaudeville." The Great Asahi, assisted by a quintette of Japanese, will present a magic act. Next week will be the last of Camille Ober, The New York Trio and Felice Morris & Co. It will also close the engagement of the Imperial Russian Dancers.

The Charity Matinee

Great interest attaches to the ninth benefit in aid of the charity fund of the Associated Theatrical Managers of San Francisco, to take place at the Columbia next Friday afternoon at two o'clock sharp. The program will be the best ever offered at an affair of this kind and so many are the volunteers that John Morrissey, Melville Marx and Fred W. Busey, the committee on entertainment, are at their wits end to so arrange the bill that it will not run longer than three hours. William Faversham and Miss Julie Opp are going to do the balcony scene from Romeo and Juliet, Blanche Walsh and members of "The Other Woman" company promise something very interesting and that bright comedy, "The Blue Mouse," which will occupy the boards of the Princess next week, will send down some of its brightest hits. The Orpheum, Max Dill, Beatrice Michelena Middleton, Lora Leib, Bessie Barriscale, Howard Hickman and other will appear. The best vaudeville acts at the Chutes, Wigwam and National will complete the bill.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—There was practically no feature in last week's stock market and the trading was entirely of the professional type and confined to the floor of the exchange. Early in the week a small buying movement occurred that carried prices up a point or two, but this soon flattened out with the evening up of traders who were inclined to stay close to shore until after election. The favorable crop news as well as the decline in the grain markets was a help to the market, but this was in turn offset by the advance in call money rates to 4 3-4, which rate was maintained during the week with prospects of further tightening temporarily next week. Business conditions are said to be improving but as yet they have not improved enough to warrant a basis for an upturn of more than moderate proportions. With the election out of the way and barring any unfavorable court decisions stocks are in a fair way to show some advance, as sentiment is undergoing a change for the better and money matters are not expected to be much of a factor. However, a setback of a few points after election would not be surprising and we think stocks should be bought on any decline.

Wheat—Powerful interests came to the rescue of the wheat market during the past week at a time when liquidation was rapidly bringing about general demoralization. There are still vast aggregate holdings of December to be liquidated unless the trade is seriously at fault. The tone of the cash demand is not such as to indicate any need of hurry in securing supplies to meet it. Well posted flour men say that the mills are generally heavily supplied with flour sold when prices were higher, on which shipping directions were not forthcoming. There is no other than a domestic outlook for the grain, as many nations are awaiting a chance at the slim demand in prospect in Europe. The importing countries appear to be full to the extent of their storage capacity. There are a large number of Australian and Pacific Coast cargoes due in the next six weeks and immediately following that will come shipments of new crop Australian and Argentine wheat. Meanwhile there is no letup of importance in the Russian shipments and Canada has disposed of only a limited supply of her large surplus.

Corn—Prices covered a range of 1 1-4 to 1 5-8 cents last week and the volume of business was as narrow as the fluctuations. The sappy condition of the new corn arriving and the small quantity of old corn moving from the farm has helped the cash and December market materially. Snappy cold weather is needed to put the new crop into merchantable condition but it appears more than this will be required to induce the farmers to let go of their property at current figures.

Cotton—The market during the past week was strong on covering of shorts and new buying for long account in anticipation of a bullish ginners' report and although realizing for profits, was quite free at times. The undertone was firm and the buying power was sufficient to absorb all offerings. The market seems to have settled down to a supply and demand basis and unless there is more evidence forthcoming in the near future in support of the larger crop estimates, it seems probable that a somewhat higher level of values will be witnessed as visible and invisible stocks of both the raw and the manufactured article are below last year's figures and it would take a crop of at least twelve million bales to satisfy the demand around current levels. On account of the almost perfect weather that prevailed for two months prior to October 28 we held forth hopes of a crop materially in excess of early small crop estimates. Christmas reports now coming to us are very discouraging and all prospect for late cotton will have to be abandoned as the plants have been killed almost to the gulf coast, leaving only the matured bolls to open and as yet it is impossible to determine to just what extent the final yield has been affected. But it is safe to say that enough damage has been done to lend color to small crop estimates and make it inadvisable to sell short until more is known as to the size of the crop.

Copper—A copper deal of magnitude and far-reaching influence in the mining and smelting industry is without doubt practically arranged. The form of incorporation will be the last detail. We have mentioned this several times since the first of August. We are now informed by one of the very best people in the world of copper that a federal charter is all that is needed to launch a giant corporation that will bear the same relation to copper interests in ramification as the steel corporation does to iron.

Local Securities—There has been a rather small market for local stocks and bonds during the past week or so and the general list stands at practically last week's prices. In view of election, those of the California securities which are generally active in New York such as Pacific Gas & Electric stocks, Western Power stocks and Western Pacific, were dull in sympathy with the regular New York stock market. Taken as a whole the list shows a high degree of firmness both in stocks and bonds and bids fair to remain that way for the balance of the year. It is felt around the street that Pacific Gas stocks, Western Power, Pacific Telephone stocks, California is a carpeted sleigh with a pair of magnificent horses. A swell coachman in heavy coat and fur hat. It is my son, who had driven over from his estate, to pay me a visit.

"We are seated at the dinner table. There are plates for ten. Only one seat is vacant, that of my granddaughter. The child was quite sick and was dining with her nurse. A special meal had been prepared for her diet; bouillon and sago.

"We had a heavy dinner of four courses with two kinds of wine, with two butlers waiting on us, flowers on the table, conversation.

"From where are these glorious orchids?" asks my son.

"My wife replies that a lady from St. Petersburg had sent them, anonymously.

"These orchids cost one and a half rubles apiece," says my son. And then he tells us how at some concert or entertainment the whole stage had been smothered with orchids. The conversation passes to music and to some great lover and patron of that art.

"And how is his health?"

"Still poor. He has to go to Italy again this year. Every time he spends his winter over there he is greatly improved."

"But the trip is a great bother and a nuisance."

"Oh, I don't know. Thirty-nine hours by express."

"It's a bore after all!"

"Well, wait, we'll be able to aviate there soon."

And with this contrast of his own luxury and the scenes of heartrending want he had witnessed only some minutes earlier the greater writer ends his tale of the second day.

"Besides the ordinary visitors and petitioners we have with us today three of a different kind," commences the final instalment of Count Tolstoi's Trilogy of Wretchedness. "The first is a childless old peasant, ending up his days in bitter want. The second is a miserably poor woman with a heap of children, and the third, as far as I know, a fairly well-to-do peasant. All the three are from our own village and are in the same trouble. Just before the beginning of the new year the taxes are being levied, and they took away from the old fellow his samovar, from the widow a sheep, and from the well-to-do peasant a cow. They all seek redress or assistance or both."

It appears that the people even do not know what the taxes are for. The samovar to a Russian peasant is almost what the gas-stove is to a tenement woman in New York. It is the source of the owner's sustenance, the great brass kettle for the making of tea. The woman has lost her solitary sheep.

On the way to the village starosta the Count is stopped by two women. One offers him some linen for sale for two rubles, the amount of her tax bill. If she fails in the transaction, they will levy on her chickens. The other is an old pupil of the Count's, herself an old woman by this time. From this one a calf had been taken.

The starosta (the village elder) explains that his instructions were very strict this year: to clear up all back dues without any fail in the new year.

The Count inquires why the poor people are deprived of their necessities. But the starosta replies that the authorities must have the money and they can't investigate who is poor and who is not.

The Count undertakes a trip to the district authorities. Here he learns that there are seven classes of taxes for which back dues must be collected. His instructions to the starosta are very strict, but so are those from his own superiors. The starosta was very sympathetic and felt pity for the poor victims, but the district chief was considerably less so, though he too expressed a decorous regret because of the hardships on the poor. But the zemstvo head was quite unsympathetic. The starosta saw that he was an instrument of evil and was willing to throw up his job, which yielded him a wage of thirty rubles. The district chief maintained his own blamelessness in the tax persecution. But the chief of the zemstvo, who had never seen those wretched people who had to part with their means of livelihood, had very little doubt as to the morality of his activity. He considered himself a useful agent of government. It was, however, the governor himself whose ideas on the necessity of paying the taxes were entirely free of any theorizing on the subject of samovars, widows' sheep, cows and linen surrendered by the impoverished peasants and his own belief in the virtue of his position was boundless. As for the ministers of state, the closing remarks of the Count may be quoted: "They feel that the taxes are but a small recompense for laboring in behalf of a rude and ungrateful peasantry." And thus ends Count Tolstoi's Trilogy of Peasant Misery, perhaps the last word of the Grand Old Man of Yasnaya Poliana, the one Russian who dares to speak his mind.

PERFECTION
OIL HEATER

Absolutely smokeless and odorless

Lighted in a moment, and quickly giving a glowing heat, the Perfection Oil Heater has enabled many a man to go to business in a cheerful, confident spirit who otherwise might have felt and shown all day the effects of a cold, cheerless breakfast-room.

It has a cool handle and a damper top. An indicator shows the amount of oil in the font. It has an automatic-locking flame spreader which prevents the wick from being turned high enough to smoke, and is easy to remove and drop back so the wick can be cleaned in an instant. The burner body or gallery cannot become wedged, and can be easily unscrewed for reworking. Finished in japan or nickel; strong, durable, well made; built for service, and yet light and ornamental.

At table she was in the best of humor; she permitted herself to remark that we were long not to respect fast days, for religion is an inestimable blessing, and fish, when one knows how to choose and prepare it, is a delicious food. My friend's firm religious principles are a secret to no one. She observes fast days, is never absent from mass on Sundays, attends the principal functions of the church, listens to sermons, goes every year on a pilgrimage to the church of Saint Anthony of Padua, and although quite aimless, confesses frequently. When we are alone together she loves to turn the conversation to these topics, and does not conceal from me her regret at seeing Silvio and me so little concerned about spiritual matters. Nor does she lose her hope of sooner or later bringing us back into the fold. One day she offered to bring a priest to see me.

"For the love of heaven, no!" I exclaimed, horrified, and Olympia did not insist.

She is a good woman who yet does not scorn the world and its pastimes.

"You should have an evening at home" she often tells me. "We gave a great many receptions when poor Vantaggiosi was alive. It was a pleasure to see such an assembly of cultivated and fashionable people. We had conversation, music, cards, and we served tea."

I am not very social by nature, and cannot satisfy my good neighbor's honest desire. There will never be "conversations" at my home, which is not saying that sometimes, at rare intervals, an acquaintance does not call of an evening. It is however impossible it may seem, these people all turn up their noses at the Vantaggiosi.

The evening one of them, a rather saucy individual, even whispered in my ear:

"Dear Signora Serponti, where did you find this sticking plaster?"

Should not one speak with greater deference to so estimable a woman?

Even Silvio, so full of consideration for her, goes out before nine o'clock, knowing me to be "the best of company," and passes the time in his favorite Cafe Florian.

For the most part we two pass our time reading the paper, crocheting or drinking the tea at my dear friend prepares with her own hands, and in which she moistens a certain kind of kisses of which she is extraordinarily fond. At Christmas and Easter, when a colleague of the dear Vantaggiosi sends her a small cake, a cake of a suitable size for a childless widow, she brings it down to us, saying:

"What is mine is yours. We must eat this cake together. But it would not be a bad idea if you to furnish a little garnishing."

Thus on these evenings the repast is more abundant, and as there is usually some other guest Olympia triumphs and intones her favorite chant: "Admit I am right. You ought to give receptions. You see what a brilliant evening we have passed. Two women alone, however fond they are of each other, must end by exhausting conversation."

It is breath wasted, as it was in regard to the best. But to recompense Olympia for the receptions I will not give, I make her a participant in some of my amusements. When Silvio and I go to the theater, twice out of three times we invite her to come with us; the third time she invites herself. Of course, she always hopes she is not annoying us, and she always says:

"It is understood beforehand that I shall sit in the back of the box. You must pay no more attention to me than if I were not present."

Olympia prefers comedy to opera, and has a weakness for risqué plays.

Oh, the French!" she exclaims, scandalously enjoying the broadest jests. It is true that the next morning she goes to confession.

On the occasions of these visits to the theater she asks permission to rummage in my boxes for a ribbon for her hair, or a scarf to throw over her shoulders, and sighs:

"Ah, five years ago I could have invited you to my box."

And thus we return to her the invitations that she could have given us five years ago. It is always well to pay one's debts.

Joking apart, when we extend our courtesies to the tenant of the third floor, she repays them with usury. For instance, when I am suffering from one of the violent headaches to which I am subject, and which lay me prostrate on my bed, she transplants her belongings to our apartment and does not move from it all day. She arranges the pillows under my head, applies mustard to my neck, sees that Silvio's meals are served on time, and, that he may miss me less, lunches and dines with him. In short, for that day she forgets that she has a home of her own; it is enough for her that we give her maid a bite to eat as well.

And what patience she has with me! I am always nervous, but when I have a headache I fly out at nothing. Day before yesterday I had a violent one. My head was throbbing madly when that dear Olympia repeated for the hundredth time in her mellifluous voice some nonsense, and her "You ought to do this," "You ought to do that," on, on like a mill. All at once I could bear it no longer, and propping myself on one elbow I cried out:

"Do you know what I ought to do? Send all bores to the devil, and regain my liberty; for since you came to live on the third floor I am no longer mistress of my own house. Have I made myself clear enough, you tiresome, silly gossip?"

After this exertion I sank back exhausted, and as through a cloud I saw the Vantaggiosi vanish in silence. Then, I confess, a thousand scruples assailed me. Was it possible that I had behaved in such a manner? And suppose Olympia took it to heart? What if, with her tendency to suicide, she should commit some rash act? What if—God help me!—she were to throw herself into a canal? In my fancy I already heard the splash. I should have rung the bell, despatched someone on the track of my friend, but my head ached too badly, and I preferred to close my eyes, saying to myself philosophically: "Let come what may!"

Soon I fell asleep, which is for me always a sign of a favorable turn. Would anyone believe it? When I awoke I found Olympia herself at my side, fairly devouring me with her eyes.

"Has it gone?" she asked with infinite tenderness. "I am not at all angry. Oh, now it is not at all as it was. Poor child, how you suffer from your nerves!"

Who could resist this gentle creature? I surrender to fate. I feel that however unworthy of so much favor, I shall bear to my grave the sweet chain of this friendship. But, oh, how content would I be if, as a token of my gratitude, I could find a third husband for her!

Auto Notes

The E. R. Thomas Motor Co. is the only firm that has succeeded in placing a successful long stroke, large valve, six cylinder motor on the market, as was demonstrated by the recent 1,800 mile trip, on high gear alone, that this type of car made through the mountainous region of the East.

Reports from the East indicate that the persistent efforts of the local automobile trade have gained the undivided support of eastern factories for San Francisco as the place to hold the Panama-Pacific Exposition. Among the local firms which have prominently identified themselves with this movement is the Diamond Rubber Co. This concern has addressed a personal letter to every automobile manufacturer in the East asking him to boost for San Francisco. The list embraces about three hundred concerns.

Rushed through by express shipment the first of the 1911 Pope-Hartford cars were received by the Consolidated Motor Car Company the other day and are now the center of interest in local motoring circles. Various reports received during the past week from eastern sources had promised much for Pope-Hartford construction and appearance this season, and now with the cars here the general consensus of opinion is that they more than justify every promise made.

Among the most prominent contenders in the Georgia Good Roads Tour were the two Haynes entries. The roads were among the worst in the south but in spite of the rough going both Haynes cars made perfect scores.

The first Lozier car offered for sale to the public was purchased by Charles L. Feltman of Coney Island. Mr. Feltman used this car for several years and then sold it to a friend and purchased a high-powered French machine. A little over a year ago Mr. Feltman placed his order for a six-cylinder Lozier touring car, expressing the belief that, in view of his experience, nothing could surpass a high-class American-built automobile. Mr. Feltman has just ordered another Lozier six-cylinder car with Limousine body of the 1911 model.

To Monogram Oil, which is the only lubricant he ever uses for his machines, Beachy attributes a large measure of his successes.

F. A. Chamberlain, a prominent auto enthusiast of Redwood City has just added another autocar to his garage. The new machine is a touring car built to order for Mr. Chamberlain and has many novel features. Delivery of the car was made by Walter C. Morris, a local autocar distributor.

 In the Matter of the Guardianship of the Persons and Estates of CORNEY RUNDLE and RICHARD T. RUNDLE, Minors.

Rundle, minors, having filed her petition herein for an Order of Sale of the real estate and personal property of the said minors and that the proceeds of said sale be invested in the shares of the San Francisco Ship Owners' Association, as more fully appears by said petition on file, and it satisfactorily appearing to me from the allegations of said petition that an advantage and benefit would accrue to the estates of said minors and those interested therein by a sale of the said real estate and personal property for the reasons set forth in said petition; and it further satisfactorily appearing to the Court that the next of kin of said minors are petitioner Hannah C. Rundle, the mother, and Ashie L. Rundle and Ethel Charlotte Rundle-Barton, sisters of said minors;
 It is therefore ordered and directed that said Hannah C. Rundle and Ashie L. Rundle and Ethel Charlotte Rundle-Barton, sisters of said minors, and all persons interested in the said estates of said minors, appear before the above named Superior Court on the 16th day of November, A. Jack London Again

In "Burning Daylight," Jack London went again into the far north for his hero, and he appears to have left his socialistic philosophy somewhere by the wayside, for if there ever was a dominating individualist it is Elam Harnish. He is of the stuff that makes pioneers wherever there is pioneering to be done, a primitive man, endowed with a magnificent body, which he has used but not abused and a brain, untrained in book lore but of a quality to match his muscles. He had gone into the wilds of Alaska long before the "gold rush," a boy of eighteen years, and he had battled with the elements and with his environment, finding no task too hard for achievement and no obstacle too great to be overcome. He had the big faults and the big virtues of a big man, and withal he was philosophical, accepting life as it came. Apparently he had never had any sort of conventional religious training and he looked upon existence as a huge gambling game in which it behooved every player to do the best he could with the cards dealt him by the presiding genius, Luck. He, himself, had been remarkably fortunate, but he did not know whether he was to continue so or whether the whimsical dealer meant to let him win and win and then despoil him of everything. It was all one. So he put the whole of his strength in whatever was on hand, whether it was work or play, carousing all night in the dance hall, making a heart-breaking winter journey against time or plunging into legitimate business enterprises. Harnish had a long head. He could look into the future and he had the gift of imagination. He called it a "hunch," and one name is as good as another. So when the Klondike discoveries sent all the world into the northwest Harnish had not only pre-empted and bought claims in every likely locality but he held title to town sights and river frontages as well. He was one of the first to thaw the ground for winter mining and the first to make use of electricity so that when he decided to come out the eleven million dollars which represented his fortune was acquired as much by hard work as by luck. Harnish, known as "Burning Daylight," from one of his favorite expressions, calling his companions to humorous account for "burning daylight," was one of those picturesque characters who are easily made the heroes of fairy tales and legends and he made good copy for the special correspondents and magazine contributors particularly since he did not take the trouble to correct or contradict the stories they sent out. He was naturally simple and direct and used to the ways of the wilderness where every man stands or falls by his own value, not hooped about like a tub, with the laws and the social conventions of his class and kept in place by outside pressure. A man's word is his word and there are no bonds. Though Harnish was boyishly unsophisticated he was no simpleton. He did not know how the big game was played in the world but he was ready to learn and it was not long before he began to receive costly lessons. He learned the value of a gentleman's agreement and the weight of a promise not sealed by legal contract, and he was an apt scholar. The financiers and friendly business men mistook him for a golden pigeon to be plucked and soon discovered their error. That encounter in the private office of the New York millionaires when they were obliged, at the pointed of a loaded revolver, to keep the word they had so lightly given and broken has one parallel, in the "best licking you ever heard of" administered by Stuart White's "Riverman" to his rascally partner. Harnish became an expert at the game of finance. He played to win, but it was no longer a friendly contest like the poker games at Circle City, which engendered no rancor. Now there came in an element of revenge, a spirit of getting even. And, too, he no longer made friends. There was no spirit of comradeship, no spontaneity. Men were only counters, to be used and dropped. The big, occasional "nights" were superseded by constant and solitary drinking, and the toll of trail and trace were replaced by joy-rides which brought no joy. It is not a pretty spectacle, that of the magnificent, primitive man deteriorating under the influences of "civilization" and city life. Curiously enough, Daylight had, in all his life known but one fear, that of subjection to woman-kind. He was like a colt that would come close enough to be stroked but would bound away at the remotest intimation of conquest, and the story of his courtship, it goes without saying, is not of the stereotyped order. Two things there were that brought Harnish to a realization of the long way he had drifted from the man he had been, that the one woman who had ever attracted him told him in plain language that despite his millions he was not desirable. He was only a machine, owned by his money, a drone whose nominal "business" was merely a rude snatching at what he did not need. The other set-back came when, going into a saloon one day, he found a young athlete beating all comers at a trial of strength in which he himself had always been paramount, and was surprised to find himself defeated easily, not once but twice, and as many more times as he would have essayed the trial. Then it was that he took stock of himself and, being the man he was, resolve to amend, to begin again. He decided that he did not want his thirty millions, that they owned him not he them, and that they would not buy him anything he wanted, and he did want Dede Mason for his wife. Here would have been a fine chance for Socialistic enterprises and philanthropies but Elam Harnish had never been given to that sort of thing and he did not begin it now. His creed was that Luck had dealt some people poor cards and no matter how much they had to gamble on they could not win so what would be the use in prolonging the fight? True to his ideas of loyalty which would not have permitted him to desert a companion on the trail, he arranged to protect his partners in the gigantic enterprises he had under way and then just let go, to live an ideal life on a small farm cultivated not to produce big crops but to make a living and give pleasure to its owners. The only work done was what was necessary for comfort, and there was time to live and enjoy. It did not become a summer colony for city folks nor a fresh air station nor an asylum for cranks. Harnish was an exceptional man, but so is Dede Mason an exceptional woman. There may be thousands of stenographers working as hard as she did in city offices but there is about one woman in ten million who would have given up those millions. It is a simple matter to forego in imagination what one is never likely to get but to have the thing lying in the palm of one's hand and not close the fist on it is another matter. "Burning Daylight" goes to prove that whatever side excursions the author takes in socialistic prophecy, he has not forgotten how to tell a story. Nothing will bring home the fact of how far the world has moved on since the days of the gold rush than the footnotes which the publishers have considered it necessary to add, explaining the terms "sour-dough," "chechaquo," "parka," "muckluck," "mush," and "husky," words that scarcely ten years ago appeared a dozen times in every newspaper and were blazoned on the advertising signs of the outfitters. The Macmillan Company, who have brought out twenty of the twenty-three books by this author, are the publishers of "Burning Daylight." Another volume of short stories under the title "When God Laughs," appeared on November 9.

Why Mr. Banker Bought in Thousand Oaks

"When a boy I used to picnic and holiday in Thousand Oaks on Saturdays and Sundays with my school day chums.

"The huge moss grown rocks or boulders and giant oaks with massive limbs formed very dear memories in my heart. We all thought it the most beautiful spot in the world.

"Upon learning that Thousand Oaks was to be offered to the public in homesites I was one of the first to come and pick out a place among the trees for my home. I am now having the plans drawn to harmonize with the natural characteristics of the lot.

"The Mameda, a continuation of Grove Street, is now paved through Thousand Oaks giving me a picturesque driveway to run home in my machine—a five minute run from the center of Berkeley.

"When the Southern Pacific's electric trains are running in early spring and the station is built at Solano Avenue, five minutes' walk from my home, I can enter train for San Francisco every seven or eight minutes, via a choice of three routes and reach the Ferry Building in 35 minutes."

Right now before the trains are running you can purchase a homesite at $25 to $35 a front foot. Write to-day for set of picture cards.

The Futility of Unity

President Taft is reported to be of the opinion that insurgents and regulars have seen the folly of their feud and will now get together and present a solid front to the enemy in 1912. This is a case of the wish being father to the thought. The differences between insurgents and regulars are as irreconcilable now as they were before the election. But even though for motives of self-interest the leaders of the Republican factions should declare a truce, abate their antipathies and unite for the quadrennial contest there is still to be considered the men behind the ballots. The quarrel between insurgents and regulars is a quarrel over the question "Who's to be in or out, who's to move the grand machine?" and the effect of it has been to make uneasy the conservative element of the electorate which has long been the backbone of the Republican party. In the past it has been demonstrated that the conservative element of the people holds the balance of power in the nation, and this element, it is not unreasonable to believe, has come to the conclusion that the Republican party is in need of chastening. A singular metamorphosis has occurred in the aspect of party politics. A short time ago the Democratic party under the leadership of William J. Bryan was the party of innovation and experiment, and the Republican party inspired by tradition was the party of ancient landmarks and guideposts; whereas the blood of Democracy was fired with rage for new-fangled devices of government, the consuming passion of Republicanism was for the preservation of all that had been accomplished by the progressiveness of the past. Now we see that the shibboleth of Republicanism is Progressiveness, and that Democracy is preaching steadfastness in the ancient faith. While the prevailing type of Republican leader is "Battle Bob" La Follette, the apostle of sansculottism, the Democratic hosts are following the high-brow banner of a Woodrow Wilson. In the circumstances it doesn't seem to matter much whether the insurgents and regulars get together in the Republican party. That party has stirred the resentment of the great conservative element of the people. Insurgency is in its system, and it is not to be purged except by a good licking.

The Hour of Change

As President Taft has been growing steadily in the affections of the people, and as they appreciate the embarrassment of his position and admire him for the superb dignity with which he has conducted himself in most exasperating circumstances, they will doubtless be most reluctant to turn him out of office at the end of his first term. And yet the situation of affairs is such that he seems destined to suffer for the sins of his party. The signs of the times portend the approach of the inevitable hour of change which Providence is said to decree, and for the forwarding of which, perhaps, insurgency was divinely designed. The world is a scene of changes. Change is the rule in all things by which improvement is made. The time is always coming for the spoke that is uppermost to be under. If one party were to remain in power indefinitely the nation would fall to pieces from dry-rot. Now all sensible men must feel that it will do us good to have a new deck of cards and a new deal. Not for a long time have the people had a peep behind the scenes, and they must be very eager to learn of some of the things that have been going on there. It will be worth our while to remove the dust from transactions that have been almost obliterated; to scrutinize, for example, the records that tell the story of the wonderful secret achievements of Theodore Roosevelt as President and also as assistant secretary of the navy when the Maine was blown up and the country was plunged into a war that opened a new epoch in American history. And oh! for a little light on the Tennis Cabinet! The prospect so strongly appeals to our enthusiasm as almost to make us feel indifferent to the immediate future of that most estimable gentleman, William Howard Taft.

A Craving of Genius

There is a singular craving in men of genius to embark in a career far different from that for which they are really fitted. Thus we find that comedians are eager to display their histrionic powers in tragic roles. Many a burlesque artist has attempted to win laurels as Shylock. Dante tried to paint an angel. Frederick the Great thought that to be able to write like Voltaire would be to attain the summit of earthly bliss. Balzac's ambition was to win distinction as a financier, and his schemes of finance he exploited in his novels. What is the explanation of this peculiar craving in men of genius? Perhaps it is due to the notion expressed by George Eliot when she said it was a clever sort of stupidity to have one sort of talent—like a carrier pigeon. Or perhaps it is due to a vague sense of power which makes great men always doubtful whether they have reached the limit of their ability, and inclines them to test their capacity in some new field for which they have no training, no inborn inclination. Whatever the explanation it is advisable never to desert your own line of talent. The man who strives to be what nature intended him to be may succeed, but there is no hope for the man who fails to interpret his own temperament.

The Prodigal Patriot's Return

Our prediction that immediately after the votes were counted, and not before, the most modest and retiring of our citizens would drop in on us fresh from his foreign journey has been fulfilled. But let not this triumph of vaticination be attributed to anything in the nature of clairvoyant power. Anyone that knows the Hon. James D. Phelan can guess what he will do in any given set of circumstances. For notwithstanding his kinship with the violet, in spite of the illegibility of his countenance, which is never fluid with expression, never rippled by the play of thought, if you have ever glimpsed the mainspring of his mental machinery you will find him ever after the most readable of men. So, though Mr. Phelan arrived in New York several weeks ago, we knew that he would keep off the firing line. We knew it because of the circumstances in which he was placed; his sympathies were with Hiram Johnson; his frazzled political organization was behind Hiram Johnson; but his sense of his political interests dictated that he should not make tangible his disloyalty to the standard bearer of his party. There is nothing so important to Mr. Phelan as that he should keep his political record straight for future reference. We have spoken of Mr. Phelan's kinship with the violet, but as we ponder his ways we wonder whether there might ever have been an illegitimate union between that flower and the ostrich. How like the stupidity of the tall bird is Mr. Phelan's self-delusion that because the mortal part of him was in Europe unseen were the energies that he exerted through agencies that are hardly less familiar than his whiskers! If treachery to a political party were a felony it wouldn't be necessary to pack a grand jury in order to indict Mr. Phelan, nor, to convict him, would it be necessary to assign the case to a Lawlor or a Dunne. Mr. Phelan is a most unfortunate patriot. The goal of his ambition is the United States Senate. According to his own testimony he marked that goal out within a week after he emerged from college, and has kept it steadily in view ever since, reminding the people of his availability every two years by soliciting a complimentary vote at Sacramento. Of late this ambition seeming to be hopeless, he has cultivated the friendship of Theodore Roosevelt with a view of getting in line for some honorary distinction of a non-partisan character; but lo, by a curious fatality just as the Roosevelt star is resolved into nebulosity and the Democratic orb begins to climb to the central blue our young patriot blunders into the outer darkness utterly disqualified for the preferment that he has craved through a life time. Mr. Phelan may plead that he was out of the State during the campaign, but he cannot explain away the treachery of his machine. The politicians that take orders from him did all in their power to defeat Bell, and that gentleman, they will probably learn to their sorrow, is not to be eliminated from the councils of his party. In the event of the election of a Democratic president in 1912 there will be retribution in store for the Phelans, the Goulds and the Dwyers.

A Contrast

How fantastic are the tricks that fate plays with the lives of men! And how curious are the workings of the universal law of compensation! If the poor man cannot get luxuries, the rich man is afflicted with indigestion. David C. Broderick, who never went to college, while working at his trade in New York resolved to become a Senator of the United States. Such was the ambition that raised a tumult in the soul of a poor mechanic, a humble member of the volunteer fire department of his native city in which he obtained his first taste of politics. Here seemingly was a case of shooting at the mid-day sun. Broderick pursued his design with a constant indefatigable zeal. With nothing but a few books he crossed the plains to California at a time when greed of gold was the passion of the hour. On all sides of him were men whose thoughts were of the golden sands that glittered in mountain streams, but the young mechanic pored on his books with the steadfast purpose of preparing himself for the career in which he had determined to embark. And perseverance was rewarded. In his thirty-fifth year David C. Broderick took his seat in the Senate. Now consider the case of Mr. James D. Phelan. Born with a golden spoon at his service, given a liberal education in a private institution, he, too, on emerging from his teens resolved to become a Senator of the United States. In this city, to which Broderick came, a stranger, Mr. Phelan entered upon his political career amid the plaudits of a host of friends, and with the ardent approval of the people. From the outset he was the darling of a large constituency. To him some ten years ago the whole city paid homage; delightful were his days, his nights ambrosian. But the halcyon period was of short duration. Now past the meridian of life Mr. Phelan's imperious days are gone. His ducats steadily accumulating, he has enough to purchase anything but the one thing that he wants, and that seems beyond his reach farther than ever. Fate has been unkind to our most public spirited citizen. For him the retrospect of life is swarming with lost opportunities. The people seem to have forgotten him. He dwells only in the minds of his tenants, and their feeling toward him is intense. He is the most successful landlord in San Francisco.

The Variable Winds of Opinion

Mr. Theodore Roosevelt having experienced the fate of all popular idols a contemporary indulges in the pleasant reflection that the repudiation of him is a vindication of public opinion. And we are told that public opinion can always be depended upon to safeguard the interests of the country. This is familiar balderdash. Public opinion has done nothing more than contradict itself. Public opinion is always contradicting itself. One day we are employed in building up an absurdity, and the next we are exhausting all our ingenuity in tearing it down. So runs the world along. And all the while the delusion persists that the voice of the people is divine. Yet we know that the voice of the people was responsible for all the impulsive movements of history, movements of error, passion and crime. Public opinion is merely the best opinion at which a multiplicity of average citizens are able to arrive. Now consider the average citizen, how little he has of that sense of what is going on in the world, the fruit of experience and observation, the tree of which is an instinct peculiar to one mind in ten thousand. Some persons acquire this instinct after years of rubbing shoulders with the unsophisticated, the majority go without it to the end of their career. The average man who has a sort of blear-eyed obliquity of mental vision, is versed in nothing but the mysteries of his own affairs. He is a self-centred individual, a member of a club or a lodge which serves for him as a clearance-house of gossip and opinion, through the refractions of which he sees all that he is capable of seeing. The men with whom he associates seem wise because they reflect his sentiments, certain staple sentiments which he regards as the profound maxims of all earthly wisdom. It was because Mr. Roosevelt was always giving utterance to these sentiments that he made a prodigious hit with the average man. The fact is that Mr. Roosevelt in the Presidency was the apotheosis of the average man. Hence his immense popularity. Whatever he said touched a responsive chord in the hearts of—the average men. He was adored because he never went over the head of the average man, because whatever he said was the obvious. He was the perfect antithesis of a statesman of the calibre of Edmund Burke, of whom it was said that from the standpoint of popularity he made the mistake of being wise before his time. Which means that he was always behind his time; that is, he judged of the present by the principles that had been vindicated by the past, his maxim being that they never look forward to posterity who never look back to their ancestors. Mr. Roosevelt has never familiarized himself with the principles of government, or the principles of any science. He dealt in nothing but expedients and in special rules that pass away with the things and conditions to which they refer, and which always appeal to the uneducated to whom immediate effect is always the paramount desideratum, and for whom ramifications of remote consequences are a study too complex for their capacity. So the truth is that the public opinion that made an idol of Mr. Roosevelt was typical, while that which has lately prevailed is the result of the steadfast march of the thoughts of the enlightened minority. Mr. Roosevelt has been found out. What was once heresy is now gospel. And yet the average man is still to be enlightened as to the true character of the amazing mediocrity and preposterous demagogue who once occupied the chair of Washington and Lincoln. Doubtless in time he will learn of the things that went on in Washington when Roosevelt was President. For now that the people have been disillusioned it will not profit the magazines to capitalize further their admiration of the great enemy of dishonesty. We shall now be regaled with anecdotes illustrative of the egotism and asininity of the greatest quack in the history of American politics.

Unawares

A song welled up in the singer's heart
Like a song in the throat of a bird,
And loud he sang, and far it rang,
For his heart was strangely stirred;
And he sang for the very joy of song,
With no thought of one who heard.

Within the listener's wayward soul
A heavenly patience grew,
He fared on his way with a benison
On the singer, who never knew
How the careless song of an idle hour
Has shaped a life anew.

Perspective Impressions

Already the price of foodstuffs is coming down with a rush, but Teddy says, "I didn't do it."

Dr. Lyman Abbott blames it on the high cost of living. Let us blame it on anything but the contributing editor, for the good doctor must keep up his circulation.

Mr. Heney says that Mr. Johnson's election will put more butter on the poor man's bread. If we have any talent for mind-reading Mr. Johnson would like to put a muzzle on Mr. Heney's most dangerous weapon.

We are told that as now seven thousand people can compel us to hold an election the majority rules. This is a curious kind of arithmetic.

"How foolish it is," says Jacob Riis, "to regard the election in the light of a Democratic victory." How foolish, indeed, when it is more gratifying to regard it in the dark of a Republican defeat.

Though the era of the high cost of living is passing, we are still doing business under the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. And President Taft's smile is extending to the back of his neck.

President Edward Feeney of the American Federation of Catholic Societies protests against "the proportionately small number of Catholics holding Federal and State offices." Perhaps Mr. Feeney thinks that political pap should be distributed on a strictly religious basis.

The Futility of Unity

President Taft is reported to be of the opinion that insurgents and regulars have seen the folly of their feud and will now get together and present a solid front to the enemy in 1912. This is a case of the wish being father to the thought. The differences between insurgents and regulars are as irreconcilable now as they were before the election. But even though for motives of self-interest the leaders of the Republican factions should declare a truce, abate their antipathies and unite for the quadrennial contest there is still to be considered the men behind the ballots. The quarrel between insurgents and regulars is a quarrel over the question "Who's to be in or out, who's to move the grand machine?" and the effect of it has been to make uneasy the conservative element of the electorate which has long been the backbone of the Republican party. In the past it has been demonstrated that the conservative element of the people holds the balance of power in the nation, and this element, it is not unreasonable to believe, has come to the conclusion that the Republican party is in need of chastening. A singular metamorphosis has occurred in the aspect of party politics. A short time ago the Democratic party under the leadership of William J. Bryan was the party of innovation and experiment, and the Republican party inspired by tradition was the party of ancient landmarks and guideposts; whereas the blood of Democracy was fired with rage for new-fangled devices of government, the consuming passion of Republicanism was for the preservation of all that had been accomplished by the progressiveness of the past. Now we see that the shibboleth of Republicanism is Progressiveness, and that Democracy is preaching steadfastness in the ancient faith. While the prevailing type of Republican leader is "Battle Bob" La Follette, the apostle of sansculottism, the Democratic hosts are following the high-brow banner of a Woodrow Wilson. In the circumstances it doesn't seem to matter much whether the insurgents and regulars get together in the Republican party. That party has stirred the resentment of the great conservative element of the people. Insurgency is in its system, and it is not to be purged except by a good licking.

The Hour of Change

As President Taft has been growing steadily in the affections of the people, and as they appreciate the embarrassment of his position and admire him for the superb dignity with which he has conducted himself in most exasperating circumstances, they will doubtless be most reluctant to turn him out of office at the end of his first term. And yet the situation of affairs is such that he seems destined to suffer for the sins of his party. The signs of the times portend the approach of the inevitable hour of change which Providence is said to decree, and for the forwarding of which, perhaps, insurgency was divinely designed. The world is a scene of changes. Change is the rule in all things by which improvement is made. The time is always coming for the spoke that is uppermost to be under. If one party were to remain in power indefinitely the nation would fall to pieces from dry-rot. Now all sensible men must feel that it will do us good to have a new deck of cards and a new deal. Not for a long time have the people had a peep behind the scenes, and they must be very eager to learn of some of the things that have been going on there. It will be worth our while to remove the dust from transactions that have been almost obliterated; to scrutinize, for example, the records that tell the story of the wonderful secret achievements of Theodore Roosevelt as President and also as assistant secretary of the navy when the Maine was blown up and the country was plunged into a war that opened a new epoch in American history. And oh! for a little light on the Tennis Cabinet! The prospect so strongly appeals to our enthusiasm as almost to make us feel indifferent to the immediate future of that most estimable gentleman, William Howard Taft.

A Craving of Genius

There is a singular craving in men of genius to embark in a career far different from that for which they are really fitted. Thus we find that comedians are eager to display their histrionic powers in tragic roles. Many a burlesque artist has attempted to win laurels as Shylock. Dante tried to paint an angel. Frederick the Great thought that to be able to write like Voltaire would be to attain the summit of earthly bliss. Balzac's ambition was to win distinction as a financier, and his schemes of finance he exploited in his novels. What is the explanation of this peculiar craving in men of genius? Perhaps it is due to the notion expressed by George Eliot when she said it was a clever sort of stupidity to have one sort of talent—like a carrier pigeon. Or perhaps it is due to a vague sense of power which makes great men always doubtful whether they have reached the limit of their ability, and inclines them to test their capacity in some new field for which they have no training, no inborn inclination. Whatever the explanation it is advisable never to desert your own line of talent. The man who strives to be what nature intended him to be may succeed, but there is no hope for the man who fails to interpret his own temperament.

The Prodigal Patriot's Return

Our prediction that immediately after the votes were counted, and not before, the most modest and retiring of our citizens would drop in on us fresh from his foreign journey has been fulfilled. But let not this triumph of vaticination be attributed to anything in the nature of clairvoyant power. Anyone that knows the Hon. James D. Phelan can guess what he will do in any given set of circumstances. For notwithstanding his kinship with the violet, in spite of the illegibility of his countenance, which is never fluid with expression, never rippled by the play of thought, if you have ever glimpsed the mainspring of his mental machinery you will find him ever after the most readable of men. So, though Mr. Phelan arrived in New York several weeks ago, we knew that he would keep off the firing line. We knew it because of the circumstances in which he was placed; his sympathies were with Hiram Johnson; his frazzled political organization was behind Hiram Johnson; but his sense of his political interests dictated that he should not make tangible his disloyalty to the standard bearer of his party. There is nothing so important to Mr. Phelan as that he should keep his political record straight for future reference. We have spoken of Mr. Phelan's kinship with the violet, but as we ponder his ways we wonder whether there might ever have been an illegitimate union between that flower and the ostrich. How like the stupidity of the tall bird is Mr. Phelan's self-delusion that because the mortal part of him was in Europe unseen were the energies that he exerted through agencies that are hardly less familiar than his whiskers! If treachery to a political party were a felony it wouldn't be necessary to pack a grand jury in order to indict Mr. Phelan, nor, to convict him, would it be necessary to assign the case to a Lawlor or a Dunne. Mr. Phelan is a most unfortunatist patriot. The goal of his ambition is the United States Senate. According to his own testimony he marked that goal out within a week after he emerged from college, and has kept it steadily in view ever since, reminding the people of his availability every two years by soliciting a complimentary vote at Sacramento. Of late this ambition seeming to be hopeless, he has cultivated the friendship of Theodore Roosevelt with a view of getting in line for some honorary distinction of a non-partisan character; but lo, by a curious fatality just as the Roosevelt star is resolved into nebulousity and the Democratic orb begins to climb to the central blue our young patriot blunders into the outer darkness utterly disqualified for the preferment that he has craved through a life time. Mr. Phelan may plead that he was out of the State during the campaign, but he cannot explain away the treachery of his machine. The politicians that take orders from him did all in their power to defeat Bell, and that gentleman, they will probably learn to their sorrow, is not to be eliminated from the councils of his party. In the event of the election of a Democratic president in 1912 there will be retribution in store for the Phelans, the Goulds and the Dwyers.

A Contrast

How fantastic are the tricks that fate plays with the lives of men! And how

curious are the workings of the universal law of compensation! If the poor man cannot get luxuries, the rich man is afflicted with indigestion. David C. Broderick, who never went to college, while working at his trade in New York resolved to become a Senator of the United States. Such was the ambition that raised a tumult in the soul of a poor mechanic, a humble member of the volunteer fire department of his native city in which he obtained his first taste of politics. Here seemingly was a case of shooting at the mid-day sun. Broderick pursued his design with a constant indefatigable zeal. With nothing but a few books he crossed the plains to California at a time when greed of gold was the passion of the hour. On all sides of him were men whose thoughts were of the golden sands that glittered in mountain streams, but the young mechanic pored on his books with the steadfast purpose of preparing himself for the career in which he had determined to embark. And perseverance was rewarded. In his thirty-fifth year David C. Broderick took his seat in the Senate. Now consider the case of Mr. James D. Phelan. Born with a golden spoon at his service, given a liberal education in a private institution, he, too, on emerging from his teens resolved to become a Senator of the United States. In this city, to which Broderick came, a stranger, Mr. Phelan entered upon his political career amid the plaudits of a host of friends, and with the ardent approval of the people. From the outset he was the darling of a large constituency. To him some ten years ago the whole city paid homage; delightful were his days, his nights ambrosian. But the halcyon period was of short duration. Now past the meridian of life Mr. Phelan's imperious days are gone. His ducats steadily accumulating, he has enough to purchase anything but the one thing that he wants, and that seems beyond his reach farther than ever. Fate has been unkind to our most public spirited citizen. For him the retrospect of life is swarming with lost opportunities. The people seem to have forgotten him. He dwells only in the minds of his tenants, and their feeling toward him is intense. He is the most successful landlord in San Francisco.

The Variable Winds of Opinion

Mr. Theodore Roosevelt having experienced the fate of all popular idols a contemporary indulges in the pleasant reflection that the repudiation of him is a vindication of public opinion. And we are told that public opinion can always be depended upon to safeguard the interests of the country. This is familiar balderdash. Public opinion has done nothing more than contradict itself. Public opinion is always contradicting itself. One day we are employed in building up an absurdity, and the next we are exhausting all our ingenuity in tearing it down. So runs the world along. And all the while the delusion persists that the voice of the people is divine. Yet we know that the voice of the people was responsible for all the impulsive movements of history, movements of error, passion and crime. Public opinion is merely the best opinion at which a multiplicity of average citizens are able to arrive. Now consider the average citizen, how little he has of that sense of what is going on in the world, the fruit of experience and observation, the tree of which is an instinct peculiar to one mind in ten thousand. Some persons acquire this instinct after years of rubbing shoulders with the unsophisticated, the majority go without it to the end of their career. The average man who has a sort of blear-eyed obliquity of mental vision, is versed in nothing but the mysteries of his own affairs. He is a self-centred individual, a member of a club or a lodge which serves for him as a clearance-house of gossip and opinion, through the refractions of which he sees all that he is capable of seeing. The men with whom he associates seem wise because they reflect his sentiments, certain staple sentiments which he regards as the profound maxims of all earthly wisdom. It was because Mr. Roosevelt was always giving utterance to these sentiments that he made a prodigious hit with the average man. The fact is that Mr. Roosevelt in the Presidency was the apotheosis of the average man. Hence his immense popularity. Whatever he said touched a responsive chord in the hearts of—the average men. He was adored because he never went over the head of the average man, because whatever he said was the obvious. He was the perfect antithesis of a statesman of the calibre of Edmund Burke, of whom it was said that from the standpoint of popularity he made the mistake of being wise before his time. Which means that he was always behind his time; that is, he judged of the present by the principles that had been vindicated by the past, his maxim being that they never look forward to posterity who never look back to their ancestors. Mr. Roosevelt has never familiarized himself with the principles of government, or the principles of any science. He dealt in nothing but expedients and in special rules that pass away with the things and conditions to which they refer, and which always appeal to the uneducated to whom immediate effect is always the paramount desideratum, and for whom ramifications of remote consequences are a study too complex for their capacity. So the truth is that the public opinion that made an idol of Mr. Roosevelt was typical, while that which has lately prevailed is the result of the steadfast march of the thoughts of the enlightened minority. Mr. Roosevelt has been found out. What was once heresy is now gospel. And yet the average man is still to be enlightened as to the true character of the amazing mediocrity and preposterous demagogue who once occupied the chair of Washington and Lincoln. Doubtless in time he will learn of the things that went on in Washington when Roosevelt was President. For now that the people have been disillusioned it will not profit the magazines to capitalize further their admiration of the great enemy of dishonesty. We shall now be regaled with anecdotes illustrative of the egotism and asininity of the greatest quack in the history of American politics.

A song welled up in the singer's heart
Like a song in the throat of a bird,
And loud he sang, and far it rang,
For his heart was strangely stirred;
And he sang for the very joy of song,
With no thought of one who heard.

Within the listener's wayward soul
A heavenly patience grew,
He fared on his way with a benison
On the singer, who never knew
How the careless song of an idle hour
Has shaped a life anew.

Perspective Impressions

Already the price of foodstuffs is coming down with a rush, but Teddy says, "I didn't do it."

Dr. Lyman Abbott blames it on the high cost of living. Let us blame it on anything but the contributing editor, for the good doctor must keep up his circulation.

Mr. Heney says that Mr. Johnson's election will put more butter on the poor man's bread. If we have any talent for mind-reading Mr. Johnson would like to put a muzzle on Mr. Heney's most dangerous weapon.

We are told that as now seven thousand people can compel us to hold an election the majority rules. This is a curious kind of arithmetic.

"How foolish it is," says Jacob Riis, "to regard the election in the light of a Democratic victory." How foolish, indeed, when it is more gratifying to regard it in the dark of a Republican defeat.

Though the era of the high cost of living is passing, we are still doing business under the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. And President Taft's smile is extending to the back of his neck.

President Edward Feeney of the American Federation of Catholic Societies protests against "the proportionately small number of Catholics holding Federal and State offices." Perhaps Mr. Feeney thinks that political pap should be distributed on a strictly religious basis.

With the World's Fair bond proposition as an inducement to the people to go to the polls last Tuesday only thirty thousand took the trouble to do so. Now it remains to be seen how many votes will be cast when less important legislation is submitted to the dear people at a special election.

The Next Legislature

A Brief Consideration of the Relations Likely to be Established between Governor-Elect Johnson and the New Lawmaking Body

By Edward F. O'Day

Not until the first roll call has been completed—and probably not even then—will it be possible to settle the vexed question of the complexion of the new legislature. A platform promise is not a reliable indication of the side upon which a lawmaker will align himself. If it were, one might say with confidence that Governor-Elect Johnson would have a comfortable majority of the two chambers to back him up in the execution of his legislative program. But so many office-seekers take a dip in the waters of oblivion and forget all about their previous promises as soon as their elections have been certified that it is not wise to put trust in their campaign professions. So we must wait for the test of a vote on some important measure to teach us who controls the legislature and to what extent. Meanwhile we are being treated to easy generalizations. One member of the "old guard"—as we may perhaps designate the shattered organization which we used to call the republican "machine"—concedes eighty per cent of the legislature to Johnson. But from what some of Johnson's supporters and sympathizers say, this is probably the generosity of one who takes defeat philosophically. For some of these supporters, expert in appraising political values, do not think that Johnson is going to have an easy time with the next Legislature. They point out in the first place that the "old guard" whips who served the double purpose of keeping the performers in line and stiffening the backbone of the reformers, will be conspicuous by their absence during the coming session. That means that legislators who are inclined to stray from the path of rectitude will not find the hindrance which existed when the lines were tautly drawn and every man was expected to do his "duty," not for a personal emolument but for the good of the side on which he was playing. In other words there is likely to be more temptation to corruption in the next Legislature than in the last two—and no governor can hope to control a lawmaker with an itching palm. Besides, there is a large percentage of "longhairs" in the new body and these gentry are hard to organize; they prefer to follow their favorite isms according to their own sweet individual wills. Perhaps it is safe to say that if Governor Johnson starts in from the jump to manhandle the refractory and scare them into line for a test vote, his path will thereafter be comparatively clear; for once it is understood that the governor has a majority behind him the political weaklings will fall into line for the sake of being on the side which can give them what they want for their constituents and themselves.

Supposing that Governor Johnson finds himself possessed of a good working majority in the Legislature—and the supposition is quite safe—it will be interesting to watch his attitude toward his political foes. Will he be vindictive or conciliatory? There will be two way of judging—by his appointments and by the new laws which he will insist upon having passed. As we have never yet had an administration which did not act upon the principle that to the victor belong the spoils and have no reason to hope for one in this stage of our political development, it may be taken for granted that the new governor will punish his enemies by turning them incontinently out and reward his friends by giving them the vacated places. But just who are the next governor's friends? It will be interesting to find out. Does he, for instance, regard Meyer Lissner, the chairman of the state central committee, as one of them? It is customary to reward the man who holds that office with a choice plum, but there are indications that Johnson does not think Lissner entitled to any great honorarium. Lissner's organization in Los Angeles went to pieces on election day and it is said that Johnson is as much angered by the small plurality he received in that county as Bell is by his beating in San Francisco. Besides it is conceded that Lissner made a number of blunders during the campaign, not the least of which was the slurring of Taft to make a Roosevelt holiday. So Lissner may get the cold shoulder. Whether such treatment would alienate the newly-elected legislators from Los Angeles is problematical. Chief among these is Senator-elect Lee Gates who is hand in glove with Lissner and might resent any bad treatment accorded his fellow worker.

But that is only a detail. Of much more importance in this matter of rewards and punishments is the well defined rumor that the new governor intends to push through the Legislature a civil service bill to cover all the office-holders of the state. If such a bill should become law it would mean that the men whom Governor Johnson appoints, and first and last he will have the filling of more than two thousand places, will be perpetuated in office, thus forming a Johnson machine of most formidable proportions.

There will be a merry war if such a measure is proposed, but war is likely to wage merrily all through the session. The question of local option will afford plenty of excitement. There is no doubt that the local optionists and the prohibitionists will so far bury their differences as to unite on some sort of a local option bill and equally there is no doubt that it will receive very powerful support. The militant "wets" in California have many lessons to learn in the strategy of campaigning. They blundered woefully in making an issue of Wallace's candidacy for lieutenant-governor and there is good ground for believing that they forced his election. If Governor Johnson should not interfere, Lieutenant-Governor Wallace will have the naming of the judiciary committee and it is not inconceivable that he will name a chairman of that committee who will take the best of care of a local option bill. Two stubborn "drys" were beaten at the recent election when E. J. White, candidate for the assembly, was snowed under in the "bloody thirty-ninth" district of this city and A. M. Drew, the opponent of George Cartwright, was beaten in Fresno; but there are a lot of "drys" in the Legislature just the same. All the Los Angeles lawmakers—nine assemblymen and five senators—would probably support local option; so would E. O. Larkins, the successor of Senator Ed Miller of Visalia. C. C. Young of Berkeley, W. F. Chandler of Fresno and G. W. Wyllie of Tulare are likely to be strong for the measure. But it happens that local optionists can rarely agree on the proper voting unit for their pet measure, some thinking that the option should be by counties and others by smaller subdivisions; so there is a very good chance to whip-saw a local option measure and thereby defeat it. But it will require skillful manipulation.

There will probably be a pretty battle for the United States senatorship, owing to the conflicting claims of Judge Works and Al. G. Spalding. Commonsense interpretation of the law shows that Spalding is entitled to the toga, but the adherents of Judge Works will find many loopholes through which to sharpshoot at the Spalding supporters. There is talk of a deadlock and the consequent re-election of Frank Flint, but this is pure speculation. It is said that Governor Johnson has gone on record in favor of the strict interpretation of the law and if that is true and he should take a hand, it means that Spalding will receive the office which he has certainly won.

At this stage of the proceedings it is pretty safe to sum up the probable history of the next Legislature by saying that Governor Johnson is going to have a hard time keeping the whip-hand, that it will be fortunate if the Legislature adjourns without some sort of a scandal and that many other things will be gerrymandered besides the electoral districts.

A Dream

A Recent Article of Timely Interest by the Great Russian Who Abandoned Home Because His Family Refused to Administer His Great Estate According to the Principles Herein Developed

By Leo Tolstói

A few nights ago I dreamt so significant a dream that several times during the following day I asked myself, "What has happened today that is so specially important?" And then I remembered that the specially important thing was what I had seen, or rather heard, in my dream.

It was a speech that struck me greatly, spoken by one who, as often happens in dreams, was a combination of two men: my old friend, now dead, Vladimir Orlof, with gray curls on each side of his bald head, and Nicholas Andreyevitch, a copyist who lived with my brother.

The speech was evoked by the conversation of a rich lady, the hostess, with a landowner who was visiting her house. The lady had recounted how the peasants on a neighboring estate had burnt the landlord's house and several sheds which sheltered century-old cherry trees and duchess pears. Her visitor, the landowner, related how the peasants had cut down some oaks in his forest, and had even carted away a stack of hay.

"Neither arson nor robbery is considered a crime nowadays. The immorality of our people is terrible; they have all become thieves!" said someone.

And in answer to those words, that man, combined of two, spoke as follows:

"The peasants have stolen oaks and hay, and are thieves, and the most immoral class," he began, addressing no one in particular. "Now, in the Caucasus, a chieftain used to raid the Aouls and carry off all the horses of the inhabitants. But one of them found means to get back from the chieftain's herd at least one of the horses that had been stolen from him. Was that man a thief, because he got back one of the many horses stolen from him? And is it not the same with the trees, the grass, the hay, and all the rest of the things you say the peasants have stolen from you? The earth is the Lord's, and common to all; and if the peasants have taken what was grown on the common land of which they have been deprived, they have not stolen, but have only resumed possession of a small part of what has been stolen from them.

"I know you consider land to be the property of the landlord, and therefore call the restoration to themselves of its produce by the peasants—robbery; but, you know, that is not true! The land never was, and never can be, anyone's property. If a man has more of it than he requires, while others have none, then he who possesses the surplus land possesses not land but men; and men cannot be the property of other men.

"Because a dozen mischievous lads have burnt some cherry tree sheds, and have cut down some trees, you say the peasants are thieves, and the most immoral class! . . .

"How can your tongue frame such words! They have stolen ten oaks from you. Stolen! To prison with them!"

"Why, if they had taken not your oaks alone but everything that is in this house, they would only have taken what is theirs: made by them and their brothers, but certainly not by you! 'Stolen oaks!' But for ages you have been stealing from them, not oaks, but their lives, and the lives of their children, their womenfolk and their old men—who withered away before their time, only because they were deprived of the land God gave them in common with all men, and they were obliged to work for you.

"Only think of the life those millions of men have lived and are living, and of how you live! Only consider what they do, supplying you with all the comforts of life, and of what you do for them, depriving them of everything—even of the possibility of supporting themselves and their families! All you live on—everything in this room, everything in this house, and in all your splendid cities, all your palaces, all your mad, literally mad, luxuries—has been made, and is still continually being made, by them.

"And they know this. They know that these parks of yours, and your race-horses, motor cars, palaces, dainty dishes and finery, and all the nastiness and stupidity you call 'science' and 'art'—are purchased with the lives of their brothers and sisters. They know and cannot help knowing this. Then think what feelings these people would have toward you, if they were like you!"

"One would suppose that, knowing all you inflict on them, they could not but hate you from the bottom of their souls, and could not help wishing to revenge themselves on you. And you know there are tens of millions of them, and only some thousands of you. But what do they do? Why, instead of crushing you as useless and harmful reptiles, they continue to repay your evil with good, and live their laborious and reasonable, though hard life, patiently biding the day when you will become conscious of your sin and will amend your ways. But instead of that, what do you do? From the height of your refined, self-confident immorality, you deign to stoop to those 'depraved, coarse people.' You enlighten them, and play the benefactor to them; that is to say, with the means supplied to you by their labor, you inoculate them with your depravity, and blame, correct, and—best of all—'punish' them, as unreasoning or vicious infants bite the breasts that fed them.

"Yes, look at yourselves, and consider what you are and what they are! Realize that they alone live; while you, with your Dumas, Ministries, Synods, Academies, Universities, Conservatories, Law Courts, armies and all such stupidities and nastinesses, are but playing at life, and spoiling it for yourselves and others. They, the people, are alive. They are the tree, and you are harmful growths—fungi on the plant. Realize, then, all your insignificance and their grandeur! Understand your sin, and try to repent, and at all costs set the people free!"

"How well he speaks!" thought I. "Can it be a dream?"

And as I thought that, I awoke.

This dream set me again thinking about the land question: a question of which those who live constantly in the country, among a poverty-stricken agricultural peasant population, cannot help thinking. I know I have often written about it; but under the influence of that dream, even at the risk of repeating myself, I once more felt the need to express myself. Carthago delenda est. As long as people's attitude toward private property in land remains unchanged, the cruelty, madness and evil of this form of the enslavement of some men by others, cannot be pointed out too frequently.

People say that land is property, and they say this because the Government recognizes private property in land. But fifty years ago the Government upheld private property in human beings; yet a time came when it was admitted that human beings cannot be private property, and the Government ceased to hold them to be property. So it will be with property in land. The Government now upholds that property, and protects it by its power; but a day will come when the Government will cease to acknowledge this kind of property, and will abolish it. The Government will have to abolish it, because private property in land is just such an injustice as property in men—serfdom—used to be. The difference lies only in the fact that serfdom was a direct, definite slavery, while land-slavery is indirect and indefinite. Then Peter was John's slave, whereas now Peter is the slave of some person unknown, but certainly of him who owns the land Peter requires in order to feed himself and his family. And not only is land-slavery just as unjust and cruel a slavery as serfdom used to be, it is even harder on the slaves, and more criminal on the part of the slaveholders. For under serfdom, if not from sympathy then at least from self-interest, the owner was obliged to see to it that his serf did not wither away and die of want; and to the best of his ability and understanding he looked after his slaves' morality. Now the landowner cares nothing if his landless slave withers away or becomes demoralized; for he knows that however many men die or become depraved at his work, he will always be able to find workmen.

The injustice and cruelty of the new, present-day slavery—land-slavery—is so evident, and the condition of the slaves is everywhere so hard, that one would have expected this new slavery to have been recognized by now as out of date half a century ago; and it should, one would have thought, have been abolished, as serfdom was abolished.

"But," it is said, "property in land cannot be abolished, for it would be impossible to divide equally among all the laborers and non-laborers the advantages given by land of different qualities."

But that is not true. To abolish property in land, no distribution of land is necessary.

Just as, when serfdom was abolished, no distribution of the people liberated was necessary, but all that was needed was the abolition of the law that upheld serfdom, so with the abolition of private property in land, no distribution of land is needed, but only the abolition of the law sanctioning private property in land. And as when serfdom was abolished the serfs of their own accord settled down as best suited them, so when private property in land is abolished, people will find a way of sharing the land among themselves, so that all may have equal advantage from it. How this will be arranged, whether by Henry George's Single Tax system, or in some other way, we cannot foresee. But it is certain that the Government need only cease to uphold by force the obviously unjust and oppressive rights of property in land, and the peo-

The Ferrer Case and the Free Masons

Editor Town Talk,

Dear Sir: It is not long since the anarchists and socialists of Europe and America celebrated the first anniversary of the death of Francisco Ferrer who was executed in Spain for inciting the Barcelona rebellion. To the anarchists and socialists Ferrer was a martyr and his death a stain upon civilization. Fortunately we are not compelled to suspend judgment any longer in this Ferrer case, as we were a short time ago when the facts were still dark. Two narratives recently published go minutely into the Ferrer case; but, remarkably enough, bring out quite different conclusions. One of these is the narrative which is being published in McClure's, the result of the investigations of William Archer, the well-known dramatic critic and translator of Ibsen; the other by Hilaire Belloc, another well-known literary man who is a member of the British Parliament, appears in the Dublin Review. Mr. Archer gives in considerable detail the facts of Ferrer's career, and though some of them are discreditable he sets them in the best light possible. But strangely enough he fails to mention one fact to which Belloc attaches considerable importance; the fact, namely, that Ferrer was a Free Mason, having affiliated with the Grand Orient in Paris and "having acquired a high position among the illumined of that secret society." The significance of this fact may be lost upon those who either do not know the incidents which led to Ferrer's execution or are unfamiliar with the purpose of Latin Free Masonry. It must be understood that the Free Masonry of Americans and Englishmen has little in common beyond mere ritual with the Free Masonry of French and Italians. Nothing could be further from the intention of an American or British Free Mason than the destruction of the Catholic Church, but that is the aim of Masonry in France and Italy, or rather of the socialists that dominate the fraternity in those countries. Here there is antagonism between Masonry and the Catholic Church, and it is probably stronger in the hierarchy of the church than in the fraternal order which has no quarrel with religion. Now Ferrer hated Catholicism as he hated secular authority, and he carried out through his Masonic connections an active educational propaganda against both. Of this Archer makes no mention, and consequently between him and Belloc there is an interesting divergence of opinion as to the force which directed the Barcelona rebellion. During the rioting only religious edifices—churches, monasteries, convents and schools—were attacked. This fact needs explanation, and Archer explains it by stating that the Catholics of Barcelona have not earned "the respect much less the love" of the working classes. He says the secrecy of conventual life gives scope to "strange imaginings," and adds "At the present moment in Barcelona one of the books most prominently exposed in every kiosk is 'El Tormento en los Conventos,' by Fray Gerundio—no mere catchpenny libel, but a serious indictment." To Mr. Archer the weird tales of some Spanish Slattery constitute a "serious indictment" of Catholic religious life, but to show his impartiality he gravely narrates that when the sacked convents were explored a "roasting bed" and a "coining apparatus" were found to be a cot for insane patients and a machine for striking medals. Nevertheless he is satisfied that the "serious indictment" of "Fray Gerundio" and the stories of "roasting beds" had made the religious houses "chronically and intensely unpopular" in Barcelona; hence the anti-clerical turn taken by the riots. Not so Mr. Belloc. He charges the attacks upon the property of the Catholic Church in Barcelona to the Free Masons. He says that they inspired the sacking and looting; that they tried to save Ferrer from execution; that they terrorized witnesses at the trial; that they called forth the protests in Paris, Rome, London and elsewhere, following his death; and that, when they discovered that the truth about Ferrer was coming out, they tried to suppress any further agitation of the matter of his execution. This is significant because European Free Masonry is a power with which writers rarely deal. Its significance for us lies not so much in its indictment of Free Masonry for opposing the Catholic Church—a matter with which the Catholic Church is probably able to deal—but in its revelation of wheels within wheels in the machinery of European revolution-mongering. All the deeds which Mr. Belloc charges to Free Masonry we have superficially charged to socialism and anarchy. But it seems, if Mr. Belloc is correct, that the anarchist and the socialist of the continent of Europe are leagued with the Free Mason. While the socialist and the anarchist aim their blows primarily at the civil power, the Free Mason is striking at religion. Working together they are battering at the safeguards of European civilization, the civil power and the Church. Now in my judgment Mr. Belloc does not thoroughly apprehend the motive that actuates the anti-church element in Latin Free Masonry. Its hostility is primarily due to the attitude of the church toward all established civil government. There are, of course, many Free Masons in the Latin countries who hate the Catholic Church as a religious institution, but the most bitter hatred of the church is inspired by its friendship for the civil power. All revolutionists hate the church because the church is against revolution whatever be the form of the government. Its theory is that only tyrants should be rebelled against and then only when there is prospect of success. The wisdom of this theory is indicated by the history of revolutions, for very few of them have proved of advantage to mankind. Wherever there are revolutionary designs there also will be found a propaganda against the Catholic Church. The first step in a revolution is to incite the people to hatred of the priests, and this is usually done by circulating scandalous stories, mischievous gossip about such things as Mr. Archer gravely discusses. The "strange imaginings" that he tells about are the same as those that plunged Paris into a sea of atheism, but historians have told us how ridiculous were the yarns that excited the people of France, and of the cruel injustice that was done to nuns and priests by a frenzied populace. Immediately after the Lisbon revolution when all wires were in the hands of the revolutionists we were told of the attacks made by the Jesuits on the soldiers, and from the press despatches at the time it seemed as though the authorities were kept busy for days deporting hordes of Jesuits. The truth has since come out that when the revolution broke out there were in Portugal not more than one hundred followers of Loyola.

A London Press Agent's Setback

The British courts do not look with favor upon ingenious press agents who seek to exploit their theatrical attractions with the aid of the law. This has been shown by the judgment handed down in a case which has attracted a great deal of attention. A press agent arranged with a theatrical manager to advertise the theater by having two women noisily ejected for refusing to doff their hats. The scheme was carried out and when the women brought an action for technical assault the case was dismissed. Then the press agent sued the manager for payment which he alleged was due him for arranging the scheme and the trick was exposed. London found that it had been "spoofed." The court held that the agreement was contrary to public policy inasmuch as it might have resulted in a serious breach of the peace and that the invocation of the law to enforce payment was a fraud on the administration of justice. So the press agent got nothing for his ingenuity.

Editor Cowell's Revenge

Having been beaten for Congress, Editor Cowell of the Stockton Mail naturally feels a little sore on Editor Irving Martin of the same city who is a light of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League and who supported Needham. And Editor Cowell is trying to get revenge by declaring that Editor Martin will not dispense the Johnsonian patronage in San Joaquin County. Here is the way Editor Cowell attends to Editor Martin's case:

"San Joaquin County is entitled to her share, for didn't she hand a majority—though somewhat reduced—to Hiram Johnson? Sure, Mike. Now, who is going to pass upon these claims? Irving Martin? No, dear folks; you're wrong.

Guess again. Boss Buckley? Don't make me laugh. George McNoble? As much chance as a hobble-skirted woman in a foot-race.

"Give up? Listen. The authoritative representative of the new State Administration in San Joaquin County is Charles E. Neumiller, warm personal friend of Governor-elect Johnson.

"Therefore, if you want your measure taken for a seat at the patronage counter, call upon genial Charley."

Considering the trouble that this news will cause Neumiller it almost looks as though he, not Irving Martin, were the object of Editor Cowell's displeasure.

Boosting by Double Negative

Great is Orange County! I know it because I read the Santa Ana Bulletin. If you would be convinced read what Messrs. Yarnell and Overshiner published in the last issue of their "conservative democratic weekly newspaper":

"Orange County, while the smallest in area in the State, is the largest for its size in wealth of its various products. Just to think of $14,000,000 for the past year. Where else can you beat it? Where else can you find the oranges, lemon, olive, fruits of all kinds, our great English walnut industry, almonds, our immense celery fields, our beans and our great grain fields. Then our truck gardening is an all-around year product. Our beet sugar industry is assuming vast proportions. We already have two sugar factories running, and two more in course of construction. Our poultry and dairy production is an immense thing. We also have some of the richest oil fields in the State. There are other things, but we have mentioned enough. Where else can you beat it? Where else can you find so many good things in such a little space? We firmly believe it can't be found on no other spot on this earth. This is a broad assertion to make, but we are like the Missourian, We'll have to be shown."

Again I insist, great is Orange County, the home of the double negative!

The Suffrage Program

Before the next Legislature is half over the Republicans will wish that they had not included that woman's suffrage plank in their platform. For the ladies—God bless 'em!—are preparing to advance upon Sacramento for a "whirlwind campaign" which is expected to "startle the State." This I learn from the Sacramento Union which quotes Mrs. Charles Farwell Edson of Los Angeles, the founder of the Political Equality League, as follows:

"I think we will send a number of brilliant representative women who are terribly in earnest in this matter to the Legislature, and they will be on hand to express themselves in behalf of the women of the South. We think ourselves most happy in the fact that the lieutenant-governor-elect is heart and soul in the movement in favor of woman's suffrage, and since he has in hand the appointment of the committee of the upper house he will favor us. We know we have the favor of the new Governor, and as the Republicans have a clear majority in both houses, of course they will live up to their platform promises. This means the submission of the amendment to the people and after that we have two years in which to conduct our campaign."

A Suffrage Conundrum

In the East the leading suffragettes are trying to answer a riddle propounded by a long-hair professor named Frederic C. Howe who wound up an address to the Equal Suffrage League of New York by asking: "Is woman suffrage a cosmic hunch?" The women did not know what the professor meant, but took the query as a compliment and are trying to resolve it out of its Sphinxlike mysteriousness into plain English.

"But cosmic hunch, whatever it might be, was easier for the women to comprehend than Mrs. Archibald Shaw's desire to have them get up every morning at 6 o'clock and begin to think," says the New York Times. "Mrs. Shaw said that women should think real thoughts, and she declared she didn't believe that many of them did. Miss Mary Garrett Hay, the league president, said that she really did, and that by 7 o'clock every morning she had her whole day's work planned out. A few of the women in the back of the room put up their hands to show that they began to think early in the morning, but the others laughed derisively.

"Mrs. Shaw has a light at the head of her bed. It's a splendid thing she says to go to some of the great people of the world, in books, and if you don't get but ten words, it is something to go to sleep with. And then there is that calm hour between 6 and 7 a. m. When the women laughed, Mrs. Shaw said:

"I really mean it."

Suffrage is becoming esoteric and it is trying very hard to be domestic.

Dai

By J. Marni (From the French)

Jack, dear:

When you come in tonight for dinner, you will find the studio in order as usual; the lamp lighted, your toddy ready, your slippers beside the fire, and your smoking coat on the back of the chair, so it will be nice and warm, when you put it on. Everything will be about the same as ever, and for a moment you will scarcely realize that I have gone—moreover, gone for good. Even now I have such a desire to remain a little longer, fearing lest, after all, you may miss your habitual tormentor, and finding something lacking, call out to me, in spite of yourself, "Dai," "Dai," and Dai will not answer. For once she will not fall on your neck, because she will already be on the train, her face pressed against the window, greedily watching the last lights of Paris fade away.

It doesn't seem possible that I have had the courage to leave you, thus denying myself the only pleasure in life, the joy of living by your side. I wonder how I have summoned strength to carry out this plan. I suppose I shall weep some, for I am weeping now as I write, and can scarcely keep the tears from falling on the paper; but all the same, I have fully decided to go. It has been a long time now that you have suffered, and that I have made you unhappy on account of loving you too much, or not understandingly, in fact loving you in such a manner as to have failed utterly to please you. For your part, you have nothing to reproach yourself with, you have always shown great patience. It must be terrible to live near a person who adores you when you have ceased to love her—and when I think that in spite of my blunders, my—my breeding, you have been considerate enough to marry me, it seems a simple sacrifice to make in return, even though the sacrifice may break my heart. I say all this so badly, but you understand, don't you? You know that your Dai is not all selfish, that she does not want to cling to your life, merely under the pretext that she is married to you. The only thing left to do is to go away and set you free from any such sentimental foolishness, as you once neatly put it—the foolishness that gets on your nerves and exasperates you. Do you know, Jack, it would be better if I were dead? But it is the eve before varnishing day, and you already have the worry of your picture. Thank Heaven, I can understand you artists, and know how little it takes to upset you. No—you don't deserve such responsibility. Then, too, here's something else I have thought of, and that is of going back to my mother. At present it will be quite convenient, for since she has grown old and ill, she no longer has anyone with her. Besides, she doesn't want anyone. She detests that sort of thing, has a horror of it. And since I am speaking of mamma, let me tell you, dear, that sometimes you have been a little hard on her. She hasn't been able to live as she would like to, she has found it necessary to do many unpleasant things, which have turned out sad enough, in order to bring me up nicely. It is easy enough to say, "Old Cat," but one must know before judging. Poor mamma. She would have asked nothing better than to do as I do. Never to stir from her small circle, to live quietly with her husband, but she had no chance; not one. No one wanted to marry her, and as fast as one lover dropped out another one had to be found to take his place, to pay the school tuition for her little Ida. I was called Ida in those days. And when you called me Dai, it gave me so much pleasure, and perhaps just a little pain, too, for although Dai sounded more respectable, more distinguished, I didn't want to seem to disown poor mamma.

Now, here's where I begin all over again to say silly things. Forgive me, and let me finish. I am almost through. I am going to live with mamma, who has rented in the suburbs of Nice, at Montboran, just one room in an old country shanty. It is near a fort, and I understand that sometimes the military band plays there. I tell you this, my Jack, so that you will not feel too badly in imagining me deprived of all amusements. But in spite of everything, I am afraid the time will seem long, I am so accustomed to you, I won't be able to keep from continually thinking of my dear husband in his Passy studio. But I shall be with you in spirit. I can see you getting up in the morning, going and coming in and out of the studio, whistling before a big white canvas, as you think up a scheme for a new picture. Because you will whistle when I am no longer there, you will whistle light-heartedly, just as a free man whistles who has recovered his liberty. Oh, how I want you to be happy; but if by chance you should feel any regret, any loneliness or pain, in fact anything wherein the presence of your Dai could be useful, here is my address at the foot of the letter. Write me and I will come, and I promise you when I do come to be very good and very reasonable, not to weep with joy, not to throw myself in your arms, as though I had just come from China, as you used to say, when you came in. I will only kiss you a little bit, just once.

Ah, well, I must go. Besides I can't see clearly any longer, I sob so. Good-bye, good-bye, Jack, my husband, and pardon this long letter. Let me sign myself once more, dear,

Your wife, devotedly,

—Dai.

P. S.—Here is my address: Madame Dai, care Madame Ida Folly, 52 Old Post Road, Montboron, near Nice.

I settled with Josephine and don't owe her anything. The milk bill for the week is paid. Your breakfast and tomorrow's dinner is ordered. Follow out the plan, and don't forget to keep the accounts straight. The cash box is in the drawer of the Louis XV. sideboard.

Once more, good-bye.

Our Wonderful Bar Association

I forget what it was the three tailors of Tooley street resolved but I am sure that whatever it was they were not more ridiculous than the gentlemen of our Bar Association who meet from time to time to reform the practice of the law. In the legal profession the Bar Association 'is a huge joke, but among laymen, doubtless, the delusion is prevalent that it is an imposing institution. To contribute to the dissipation of this delusion I made inquiries regarding the professional standing of the lawyers who met as the Bar Association the other night to advise the judges of the Superior Court as to how they should conduct litigation. I learned that there were not more than fifteen gentlemen at the meeting, and prominent among them were a police judge, E. A. Belcher, Daniel O'Connell, Frank Schilling and Warren Olney Jr. Of the others there were not more than three who have any more practice than the gentlemen I have mentioned. Now imagine lawyers having no more to do with the litigation that engages the attention of our courts than these gentlemen, concerning themselves about devices for facilitating and accelerating the business of our courts. The truth is that very few of the active members of the bar are ever seen at meetings of the Bar Association, and that the lawyers with enough practice to keep them warm who do attend the meetings are gentlemen with hobbies and not much else. These gentlemen are congenital reformers whose early education was neglected. They are familiar with the forms of law but not with its fundamental principles. Hence the absurdity of much of the legislation they propose, a fair specimen of which is the measure empowering district attorneys to amend indictments. There are several decisions that explain the unconstitutionality of this proposition, but our Bar Association has never heard of them.

More Tax Eaters Wanted

A new trio of Tooley street tailors bobbed up the other day in the persons of the Hon. Marsden Manson, City Attorney Percy Long and Supervisor Hayden. They whereased the urgent need of a new State commission and resolved that it should be created. These gentlemen are profoundly concerned about the taxation of public service corporations. The process by which they are taxed now is too cumbersome to suit our distinguished trio of menders. They feel that it should be in the hands of a few men, and that the State pay-roll should be lengthened to meet the emergency. So naturally enough they met and attended to the matter. In due time their scheme will be presented to the legislative body that meets every two years to mend the times that are always out of joint by adding a few more burdens to the quiescent back of the unprotesting taxpayers.

Hubby—Your milliner's bill last year has cost me as much as the salary of my two bookkeepers. That is more than I can afford.

Wife—Well, discharge one of them.

Clark Beat Them

The football heroes of California University are greatly indebted, I am told, to Professor Clark of Palo Alto. The explanation is that Professor Clark has absorbed all the enthusiasm that formerly existed in the student body of Leland Stanford Jr. University. Every great achievement on the college gridiron is a triumph of enthusiasm, and when there is a deficiency of it there is a handicap that is not to be overcome. Down at Palo Alto Professor Clark has been absorbing enthusiasm ever since he began enforcing discipline by methods that have tended to break the spirit of the college community. Professor Clark is a wet blanket separating the students from the president, David Starr Jordan, the man to whom they were wont to look for inspiration and encouragement, but who of late has held himself aloof. Over in Berkeley there is an entirely different state of affairs. President Wheeler has been steadily drawing closer to the students, entering into sympathy with them in all their affairs, social as well as scholastic, and he has imbued them with the true college spirit. There is now an abundance of enthusiasm in the State University, and this, I am told, is what won the football game.

A Welcome Deliverance

Let us not forget to include in our approaching thanksgiving a special laudamus for the passing of the annual football game between our two universities. Now that that ordeal is over for another twelvemonth there is reason for rejoicing. It is not the wild-eyed antics of exuberant and lusty-lunged sophs and freshies who make day garish and night hideous on this recurrent festival that I object to, but rather the manner in which the game is treated in the morning newspapers. There is more nonsense written about that annual football game than about any other matter of news. The November football field where Berkeley and Stanford meet to chase the muddy pigskin with flying feet is the happy hunting ground of the special writers and they slay more good English on that occasion than during all the rest of the year. By stupendous efforts they stretch their vocabularies to include all the sesquipedalian adjectives in Roget's Thesaurus, and fling their ponderous verbiage at our unprotected heads. It is unnecessary to single out individual offenders. All are equally guilty. They eke out a pennyworth of sense with an intolerable deal of epithets and then have the audacity to sign their names to the farrago. Does anybody read all this nonsense? Or reading it, does anybody admire it? I cannot conceive the possibility. By all means let us render thanks that the linguistic disturbance is over.

Judge Lennon and the Leaguers

Across the bay from the smiling shores of Marin comes the murmur of trouble between Judge Lennon and the gentlemen of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. Judge Lennon, having been elevated by an enthusiastic electorate to the appellate court of the first district, must need vacate his seat upon the superior bench in Marin County. There can be no argument on that point, but Judge Lennon and the leaguers differ as to the proper time for His Honor's withdrawal. Judge Lennon is of the opinion that in order properly to qualify for the position of appellate justice he must resign before the expiration of Governor Gillett's term, and being a sound lawyer Judge Lennon ought to know. But the Lincoln-Roosevelt Leaguers who can see with half an eye that this construction of the law will give to Governor Gillett the appointment of Judge Lennon's successor, insist that Judge Lennon must stay on the superior bench until Governor Johnson takes office. Of course they want Governor Johnson to have the privilege of filling that place on the bench and already there is more than one applicant besieging the ear of the governor-elect with petition for the position. At the present writing it looks as though Governor Gillett will have the filling of the vacancy.

The Shrievalty Upset in Marin

One of the amazing results of the county election in Marin was the defeat of Sheriff "Billy" Taylor by one J. J. Keating, an engineer on the Northwestern Pacific hitherto unknown to politics. Taylor has always been very strong in Marin politics and his defeat by a tyro has aroused a great deal of curiosity. There are various explanations. One is that Harry Flannery sought revenge on the sheriff for implicating him in the "fake poolroom" case of recent date and worked against him hand in glove with the Cochranes who hate Taylor even more than Flannery does, if that is possible. Another explanation is that Supervisor Pistolesi and his Sausalito crowd who have never forgiven Taylor for waging war on the poolrooms bent every effort to compass his defeat. They also tried to defeat District Attorney Boyd but he was too strong for them.

The Courageous Mr. Barry

Mr. Richard Barry of our town, war correspondent, novelist and magazine writer, is a man of stupendous courage. It is not long since he put his lance in rest and tilted in full career against the Knight of Oyster Bay. Now he has taken up the cudgels with a woman. Yet Barry is not ungallant; he would be the last to seek a fight with one of the skirted sex. He is just now having an unwilling bout with one of the suffragette chiefs who asks no quarter from any mere man and is altogether capable of defending herself. I refer to Mrs. Catt of New York, one of the most militant of her order. Mr. Barry quoted Mrs. Catt in a magazine article as having said that woman suffrage would eliminate the social evil. Mrs. Catt vehemently denies that she said anything of the kind. But Mr. Barry stands firm. He insists that she did make the statement. At the same time he confesses that he is sorry he quoted her. "Experience," says Mr. Barry, "has taught me it is unsafe to quote any woman in connection with any question pertaining to suffrage. I made the exception in her case only because she holds the most eminent position in her society." And then the bold Mr. Barry delivers what looks like a knockout blow by declaring that he has proved "women to be as hopelessly at sea in political affairs as lawyers know them to be in 'remembering' a conversation." I advise Mr. Barry to avoid all suffrage meetings in the future, if he values his skin.

A British Art Critic

A good story is going the rounds which concerns Mr. William Berg, the well-known grain broker who is dubbed the "great German traveler" by his numerous friends. As all who know this genial host are aware, he possesses a very handsome bungalow on the "hill" in Sausalito and among his treasures is a very rare collection of paintings by celebrated masters. A prominent Englishman who was visiting here not long since was a guest at the bungalow and after one of the dinners for which Mr. Berg is justly celebrated, was shown the paintings, being for some reason regarded as a connoisseur in art. Mr. Berg, with pardonable pride, talked over the fine points of this picture and that, and reserved as the piece de resistance a picture of St. Sebastian by Guido Reni. The painting is a three-quarter length of the martyr and shows him just after his body has been filled with the arrows of his executioners. The value of the masterpiece can be realized when it is known that Mr. Berg's late father refused an offer for it of fifty thousand dollars made by the British Government. Leading the Englishman to this painting Mr. Berg paused breathlessly, awaiting the "voice" of the critic. When he blurted forth, "By Jove! it looks like a bloody pin cushion!" Berg fainted.

"Brown has wired me to send him up some fishing tackle."

"A nuisance, isn't it?"

"No; that isn't it; but I can't remember whether he favors Scotch or rye."

The Heney Love-Feast

My sense of artistic values prompts the observation that the delightful love-feast in honor of the Hon. Francis J. Heney the other night was a somewhat illogical epilogue. According to my recollection the catastrophe of the drama—speaking in terms of dramatic technique—occurred a year ago when the people of San Francisco took occasion at the polls to tell Mr. Heney just what they thought of him. I believe that Mr. Heney himself precipitated the occasion by appealing to the people for a vote of confidence and an expression of gratitude and that their response was far from cordial. Indeed their repudiation of him was not merely emphatic but cruel. They gave his comparatively unknown opponent a majority of ten thousand. So it is evident that the epilogue and the drama in chief do not hang together. The protagonists of the epilogue played well their parts in an earnest effort to give it verisimilitude, but from the very nature of things they were unconvincing. With the audience conscious of all that went before, the sentiments of the actors never rang true. Take for example the speech of Mr. Chester Rowell: "The City of San Francisco welcomes back Heney to the city he regenerated. For the city is regenerated and the graft prosecution did not fail." While Mr. Rowell, an excellent mummer, was thus reciting his lines, there were ringing in the ears of the audience echoes from Chicago of the speech of the heaviest of the tragedians, Mr. Rudolph Spreckels. Like the voice of the ghost from the depths in Hamlet came Mr. Spreckels's wail: "San Francisco is not regenerated. It is still incorrigible. The present Administration is as bad as any it has ever had." Now while there must be conflict in all drama, this sort of conflict is fatal. Mr. Rowell's speech was intended to be taken seriously, but the impression that it gives is precisely the impression that Shakespeare produces when he makes Antony speak of Brutus as an honorable man.

A Flood of Irony

Nearly all the speeches in the epilogue had an unintentional ironical flavor; for example, the

of Jesus, and my whole life underwent a sudden transformation. Why so? Because I understood the doctrine of Jesus in a different way from that in which I had understood it before." He goes on: "Like the thief on the cross I believe in the doctrine of Jesus and this belief has made me whole. Like the thief I knew that my past and present was vile; I saw that the majority of men about me lived unworthy lives. I knew, like the thief, that I was wretched and suffering, that all those about me suffered and were wretched and saw before me nothing but death to save me from this condition. As the thief was nailed to his cross, so I was nailed to a life of suffering and evil by an incomprehensible power. In all this I felt that I was like the thief. There was, however, a difference in our conditions; he was about to die, and I—I still lived. The dying thief thought perhaps to find his salvation beyond the grave, while I had before me life and its mystery this side the grave. I understood nothing of this life; it seemed to me a frightful thing, and then—I understood the words of Jesus, and life and death ceased to be evil; instead of despair I tasted joy and happiness that death could not take away." In "My Religion" Tolstoi says that after having read all the biblical interpretations of the wise critics without satisfaction, he pondered the words of Jesus, "Except ye * * * become as little children, yet shall not enter into the kingdom of Heaven!" and then he suddenly understood what had been so meaningless before. Then he put all commentaries out of his mind, and this was the passage that gave him the key to the whole: "Ye have heard that it had been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil." The words "Resist not evil" made all things clear to him. They mean, he says, that when struck you must turn the other cheek, you must do good to them that injure you; that whatever injury the evil-disposed may inflict, you must bear. "When we say 'Love your enemies,'" says Tolstoi, "we express the very essence of Christianity." And it was because the State exacted from him an anti-Christian activity that he quit the service of the State and resolved thenceforth to live a life of love, humility and self-denial.

His Latter Day Philosophy

Of the many biographies of Tolstoi that have appeared from time to time in the past twenty years, the most complete and sympathetic, it is said, is Birulkof's which is still to be translated from the Russian. But this has not been brought so nearly down to date as Mr. Aylmer Maude's which appeared in London about a month ago. From a review of this work I learn that as a reformer Tolstoi's views have greatly changed in recent years, and that he no longer cares two straws what has been done with the forces of nature, his sole inquiry being what has been achieved with the brute forces in man. Furthermore he has had no desire of late to alter any controlling mechanism in the world from government to policemen: his only concern has been with a man's heart. That is why the revolutionaries in his own country have regarded him alternately with reverence and contempt. When they ask his advice as to the best means of upsetting authority they only receive the old answer, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Cacsars, and to God the things that are God's." Of late he has come to see that much of his old philosophy opened the way to every sort of casuistry. Marriage was the only outwork in his former philosophy undefended by a mechanical test of right and wrong. In his Kreutzer Sonata absolute chastity was ordained as the Christian ideal. And now everything relating to it, according to Tolstoy, is a question of motive; its sanctity depends on the reason for which it is undertaken. There is one side of Tolstoy's character, the reviewer tells us, which has never been given sufficient prominence—the frank, open, boyish brightness of his soul. Always a joyous comrade, "he was full of the merriest ardors, especially when on a horse, and with enough of the old Adam in him to listen absorbed to the real adventures of sport."

So Old It's New

The story of Thomas Hill's historical painting, "The Driving of the Last Spike," was told in the Call last Monday. By way of preface the Call tells us that "the true story has just come to light," the story that the picture was not at all historical inasmuch as Senator Stanford required the artist to represent him as the dominant figure of the occasion, and banish persons that were in the scene, filling their places with others who were thousands of miles away when the last spike was driven. This story is new only in the sense of its being very old. It has been printed probably no less than a thousand times. But it is a good story, and when news is slack, as it usually is on Monday morning, perhaps it is really worthy of first-page prominence.

The Knocking of Spalding

Until last Sunday Mr. John D. Spreckels was generally believed to be the sincere and warm friend of Mr. A. G. Spalding, but as the San Diego millionaire was gratuitously damned with faint praise in the Sabbath Call speculation is now rife as to whether the affections of the putative proprietor of that paper have been alienated. By way of pretext for plunging the stiletto into Mr. Spalding the Call employed that time-worn device, a letter of inquiry from "an old Californian." This mythical personage expressed the opinion that there was no rhyme or reason for nominating Mr. Spalding for United States Senator, and expressed the desire of knowing whether his nomination was a joke. The answer is "No, it wasn't a joke; Mr. Spalding is a genuine personalty, a good sport and a square man, known to everybody who reads the sporting pages of the daily papers." This is what is known as the newspaper knock adept and also as the boost sinister. The intention of the author of course is to imply that Mr. Spalding is a man of very few parts, of whom there is not much to be said; in short merely "a genuine personalty," which, liberally interpreted means that he has length, breadth and thickness with the power to breathe. All of which to be sure is most unjust. The least that can be said of Mr. Spalding is that he is a self-made man. Ordinarily this does not mean much, though in this country it is supposed to be the highest form of eulogium. Many men that are self-made are very poor architects. But Mr. Spalding is really of the finest type of self-made man. He is something more than a good sport and a square man; he is the head and front of an industry of great magnitude which he founded and the success of which is conclusive of the kind of ability that is needed in the management of the business affairs of this country. But Mr. Spalding is above all things a genuine gentleman, and as such he seems singularly out of place in the profession of politics as practiced in this glorious Republic. He entered this sphere reluctantly, and, singularly enough, mainly at the earnest solicitation of his friend Mr. John D. Spreckels. Perhaps I should explain that I do not believe Mr. Spreckels is guilty of treachery. Rather do I believe that the damning of Mr. Spalding with faint praise is but a fresh exhibition of the double-cross which the men on Mr. Spreckels's pay-roll are ever on the alert to give to the gentleman who employs them.

Phelps Refused to be a Soldier

How many people know that Rear-Admiral Thomas Stowell Phelps who retired from active service on account of age last week, was intended by his father for the army? "Tom" Phelps' father was a rear-admiral and for some reason or other desired that his son should serve Uncle Sam in the land service rather than on the sea. So he secured for him an appointment to West Point. When young Phelps heard what his father had done he left his home in Portsmouth, Virginia, and called on President Lincoln at Washington. "I want to ask for an appointment at Annapolis," he said to the President. "But I have appointed you to West Point," said President Lincoln. "Yes, but I desire to enter the navy, to be in the service with my father," replied the youngster. "Well, my boy," answered Lincoln, "you are the one most interested. I will appoint you to Annapolis." And he did.

Count Lyof Tolstoi

Twenty-five years ago Pierre Besushkof was described as "an overgrown child who seems to be lost in a wholly unfamiliar world." Pierre Besushkof is one of the three heroes of Tolstoi's "War and Peace," and he is an autobiographical study of the remarkable genius who, like an overgrown child, left his home and family the other day to wander far away from a world whose sorrows he mourns and end his days among strangers in a monastery. Tolstoi has been talking for many years of doing this very thing, of realizing the doctrine of renunciation that he has preached for a quarter of a century. A strange career has been that of this Russian nobleman. Born in the Russian province of Tula, educated at the University of Kasan, in his youth he entered the army, and at the age of twenty-three he became an officer of artillery. He saw life in country and city, in camp and court. He was among the defenders of Sebastopol, and the impressions he then gathered he used as material for a series of War Sketches which he published at the age of twenty-eight, immediately winning a wide popularity. A little later came his "Childhood and Youth," remarkable alike for its artless revelations touching the genesis of ideas and emotions in the minds of the young, for its idyllic pictures of domestic life, and for its graceful descriptions of nature. In 1860 appeared "War and Peace," an historical romance in several volumes, dealing with the Napoleonic invasion of 1812 and the events that immediately followed the retreat from Moscow. It was seized upon with avidity and produced a profound sensation. In this work as also in "Anna Karenin," Tolstoi is pitiless in his portrayal of the vices and follies of the aristocratic class and warm in his praise of simplicity and unpretending virtue. Pierre Besushkof is represented as a product of a transition period who yearns for mental tranquility. We are shown Pierre wandering aimlessly about the streets of Moscow until captured by the French. Then from a simple soldier, a fellow prisoner, he learns the true meaning of life and the importance of simplicity and the brotherhood of man. A few years after the appearance of "War and Peace" Tolstoi astounded his countrymen by quitting society and devoting himself to a life of simplicity and frugality on his estates.

His Religion

In 1884 in a preface to his work entitled "My Religion," Tolstoi wrote, "For thirty-five years of my life I was, in the proper acceptance of the word, a nihilist—not a revolutionary socialist, but a man who believed in nothing. Five years ago faith came to me; I believed in the doctrine of Jesus, and my whole life underwent a sudden transformation. Why so? Because I understood the doctrine of Jesus in a different way from that in which I had understood it before." He goes on: "Like the thief on the cross I believe in the doctrine of Jesus and this belief has made me whole. Like the thief I knew that my past and present was vile; I saw that the majority of men about me lived unworthy lives. I knew, like the thief, that I was wretched and suffering, that all those about me suffered and were wretched and saw before me nothing but death to save me from this condition. As the thief was nailed to his cross, so I was nailed to a life of suffering and evil by an incomprehensible power. In all this I felt that I was like the thief. There was, however, a difference in our conditions; he was about to die, and I—I still lived. The dying thief thought perhaps to find his salvation beyond the grave, while I had before me life and its mystery this side the grave. I understood nothing of this life; it seemed to me a frightful thing, and then—I understood the words of Jesus, and life and death ceased to be evil; instead of despair I tasted joy and happiness that death could not take away." In "My Religion" Tolstoi says that after having read all the biblical interpretations of the wise critics without satisfaction, he pondered the words of Jesus, "Except ye * * * become as little children, yet shall not enter into the kingdom of Heaven!" and then he suddenly understood what had been so meaningless before. Then he put all commentaries out of his mind, and this was the passage that gave him the key to the whole: "Ye have heard that it had been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: But I say unto you, That ye resist not evil." The words "Resist not evil" made all things clear to him. They mean, he says, that when struck you must turn the other cheek, you must do good to them that injure you; that whatever injury the evil-disposed may inflict, you must bear. "When we say 'Love your enemies,'" says Tolstoi, "we express the very essence of Christianity." And it was because the State exacted from him an anti-Christian activity that he quit the service of the State and resolved thenceforth to live a life of love, humility and self-denial.

the dramatic critic, has arrived. Mr. Chesterton expresses himself in his weekly causerie in the London Illustrated News. He speaks of Mr. Archer as one who "believes himself to be a free thinker—and he never was more mistaken in his life." He then proceeds thus: "He was attacking a recent criminal trial that has taken place in one of the Southern States of Europe; and he could not rid himself of the fixed notion that every trial ought to take place in a London police-court. He started with the assumption that the English is the ideal legal system. It did not seem to occur to him that it is not very easy to find the ideal legal system. * * * At first I could not understand such a man as the writer in question taking it totally for granted that all foreign trials were to be judged on an English model. I should have thought that a man who could stretch his mind to understand Norwegian dramatists or Russian novelists might have managed to stretch his mind to understand a system of law that is almost universal in the one civilized continent of the world. * * * When a great lawyer himself is bamboozled by the law, it is not wonderful that a good, innocent, provincial, and groping Agnostic should be taken in by it too."

Again the Janney Case

The whole wretched case of the suicide of Lieutenant Janney at the home of Lieutenant-Colonel Ames in Manila bade fair for a while to be reopened by another court-martial in Manila. First Lieutenant Frank H. Adams of the Twelfth Infantry, the regiment to which Janney belonged, was charged with perjury in connection with the Ames court-martial and, it is understood, was placed under arrest at Fort William McKinley. Lieutenant Adams was a witness in the case against Lieutenant-Colonel Ames and testified to seeing familiarity between Ames and Mrs. Madeline McKissick Janney. While on the stand the witness testified that the date on which he had seen the couple was the day after he was officer of the day. On rebuttal evidence was brought out to show that Lieutenant Adams was in error as to the date stated in his testimony. Apparently the point was essential for the contradiction in dates led to the preferring of the grave charge of perjury against the lieutenant. It looked as though this miserable Janney case would never be closed, but Major-General Duvall to whom the charge was forwarded, recommended its disapproval for the reason that it could not be sustained.

And Now It is Colonel Ames

I have grown tired chronicling the courts-martial which followed the discovery by Lieutenant Janney that Lieutenant-Colonel Ames possessed his champagne cooler. I doubt whether the annals of our army can supply a record in any way comparable to the untoward events at Fort William McKinley in Manila. In addition to the courts-martial two officers of the Twelfth Infantry have been ordered to the hospital for "observation and treatment." The first was Chaplain Dallam who criticised the actions of one of his superiors in connection with the Janney suicide. The other is Lieutenant-Colonel Ames himself. He has been ordered to the military hospital at Los Banos, Laguna, the supposition being that he is suffering from some temporary mental disturbance. That sort of thing is far from rare in the Philippines where the tropic heat plays curious tricks with occidentals who stay there too long. Those who have read Kipling's stories of India and Jimmie Hopper's stories of the Islands will remember a number of instances of the sort. It is likely that Lieutenant-Colonel Ames has been stationed in the tropics too long and is in need of a change of air.

The American Reporter in London

Great Britain and the British never have had any use for American newspapers although they are willing to tolerate the New York Evening Post and the Boston Transcript. Still less do they approve American newspapermen. Even Lord Northcliffe who has learned a good deal from American newspaper methods and who praises American journalism whenever the opportunity presents itself has been unable to break down the huge prejudice entertained by his countrymen. Of course this prejudice is partly founded and partly unfounded, the unfounded part predominating. Readers will recall that there was a newspaperman in that delightful comedy "A Woman's Way" which Grace George presented in this city on her last appearance here. As the play was written by a newspaperman, Thompson Buchanan, it was not surprising that the character of the newspaperman was faithfully drawn. "A Woman's Way" has just had its premiere in London and has met with considerable success, such capable players as Miss Alexandra Carlisle and Mr. Charles Quartermaine appearing in the cast. But in the English presentation the reporter carries a cigarette behind his ear! Personally I never in my experience met a reporter who carried a lead pencil behind his ear, to say nothing of a toothpick or a cigarette. Such a vulgar touch could only come from the vulgar mind of the London manager whoever he may have been. Yet Londoners who go to see the morals of the old San Francisco. Here is the way he delivers the blow: "In San Francisco, where one might suppose a play like 'The Second Mrs. Tanqueray' would find great favor, that work fell flat. The explanation was that the play carried no illusion for the Golden Gate audiences. The city—it was explained—was full of Mrs. Tanquerays then, and the play seemed to be too much of a moral indictment to find favor as a superb realistic drama." This is interesting, if true; but its truthfulness is hardly to be granted on Mr. Frohman's ipse dixit. I am curious to know who it was that accounted for the initial failure of this Pinerotic play on such ingenious grounds and my curiosity extends to the character of the cast which presented it. have failed in this city because of the Great plays which have succeeded elsewhere wretched players sent here to present them. I fail to recall a single play which was distasteful to a San Francisco audience because it constituted an indictment of our morals. We do not pretend to be holier than other cities, for we are not hypocrites. We have never been super-sensitive about whatever wickedness abides with us and have no objection to seeing it castigated in a proper manner. I suppose Mr. Frohman would have us infer that the drama succeeded in New York because that virtuous town had a smaller complement of Mrs. Tanquerays than this city. This is a supposition provocative of laughter.

Swat at Our Town

Writing for the Saturday Evening Post his reminiscences of the old Lyceum Theater in New York Daniel Frohman has taken occasion to swat

Is Society Weary of Dancing?

I am moved to ask this question by the attitude which a number of our social top-notchers assumed toward the ball which Ned Greenway gave at the Fairmont on Monday night. Not that these people snubbed Ned's hospitality—perish any such horrendous thought! But just the same they took their time about getting to the scene of the festivities. Quite a number attended box parties to witness the opening of Mr. Faversham's or Miss Walsh's theatrical engagement while a good many more were detained at the St. Francis by Charles Kellogg's wonderful lecture on bird lore. Among these late arrivals at the ball were the cream of the cream of the elect, notably Miss Jennie Crocker who sat through the performance at the Savoy. Of course when they reached the Fairmont the merriment took on an increased tone of zestfulness, but that is not the point. One does not have to be gifted with a wonderful memory to remember the time when nobody would dream of dividing an evening between a Greenway ball and a theater or lecture. When Ned set a date for a party, that date was sacred to Ned and all other engagements, except of course dinner engagements, were relentlessly turned down. The change is conspicuous, hence my query: Is society wearying of dancing? Do our elect think that a scant hour before the midnight supper is enough to devote to the dance? It is an interesting question, but before answering it I will await more light.

The Youngsters Still Enthusiastic

Certainly there is no indication that this bored attitude toward dancing has spread to the younger set in society. It is bound to reach them in time, if it persists in the older circles, because the youngsters delight to ape their elders in anything savoring of sophistication. But so far the young people maintain their enthusiasm for the waltz and the two-step. The season's debutantes and the belles of a season or so were on hand at the Greenway bright and early. And if I needed clinching proof I would refer you to the closing night of the Kirmess. After dancing for five nights those who participated in the big charity affair were so far from being tired of dancing that they put in three solid hours Saturday morning in the St. Francis ball room. Indeed even during supper they could not restrain their dancing fever, for when the orchestra played the various Kirmess numbers the occupants of the tables arose and did a few impromptu steps.

Fulchritude in the Kirmess

By the way, have you ever noticed how vastly superior the young ladies of society are in the matter of looks to the chaps who enjoy the freedom of the charmed circle? It was at no time more evident than during this same Kirmess. All of the girls who took part were strikingly good looking, many of them very beautiful; and without exception they were endowed with grace of figure and movement. The young men, on the other hand, were quite an ordinary lot. I am speaking of their outward demeanor only. Whatever charms of mind they may possess are not reflected in their faces and their forms. I did not see a single one who reminded me of Apollo or Antinous. They were either too thin or too fat and their faces are modelled on rather insignificant lines. Our society girls may be compared with the pick of the world's beauty marts, but not our society chaps.

Jennie Crocker, a Query

One of the unfortunate circumstances about a social position of the sort enjoyed by Miss Jennie Crocker is this—the possessor must submit to being the theme of general discussion. One who is a personage in society must expect to be the subject of general talk almost as much as one who is a personage in politics or on the stage. Added to Miss Crocker's social prestige is her immense wealth, so it is small wonder that her name is frequently on the lips of people who have never seen her and have no expectation of meeting her. I heard a woman of this sort, a shrewd judge of human nature and fortified by considerable knowledge of the world, discussing Miss Crocker's matrimonial prospects a few days ago. Now this woman had no interest in Miss Crocker on account of her being Miss Crocker, the society girl and the heiress of millions; she was interested in her because she typifies a distinct class of young American women. And she insisted that she would not be surprised if some young Lochinvar would ride out of the unknown and capture Miss Crocker. To prove the likelihood of such a happening she pointed out that Miss Crocker is surrounded by young men who are either striving to woo her for her wealth or are restrained by her wealth from attempting to woo her. She said that she did not think that Miss Crocker found much enjoyment in her circle, because it is too circumscribed for the natural exuberance of youth to expand in and dominated by oldsters who expect Miss Crocker to share their bored views of social diversions. So this woman said that if a presentable chap should ride through the sacred portals of Miss Crocker's exclusive demesne and carry her out to the world of simple and natural enjoyment, he would be able to win her affections without difficulty. I wonder if this woman is right?

not be induced to give it a high rating. After the post season games following the Coronado tournament, the club fell into a rut of deadlines as it had nothing else to attract at that time weather prohibiting tennis. A number of members who also belonged to the Burlingame Club withdrew, owing to petty jealousies aroused by the polo season. In this connection it is rumored that Henry T. Scott's constant urging is responsible for the fact that Jennie and Templeton Crocker did not join, though the club is located on the rim of Uplands, their estate, and new members were few and far between. During the day of the club's worst doldrums in the past summer, Eugene De Sabla Jr. made a generous offer that aroused club hopes of rivaling Burlingame for a time. De Sabla offered to contribute $500 towards the establishment of a picturesque golf course, which would have been sure to arouse club interest, but it was not to be. More than $5000 was needed, other contributions were no forthcoming and De Sabla's offer was disregarded. The tennis playing contingent, a small number enthusiasts, including the T. A. Driscolls, the Brewer girls, Norah and Amy, Vera De Sabla, and Tobin, the Jack Casserlys, Lansdales and Howards have been the free spenders, and almost the only ones, of the past summer. An ever increasing wonderment has been manifested as to meeting payments for the polo field and there was some talk at one time of moving to a cheaper location in the foothills. But polo means more money, for the demands of that sport on players and spectators are such that liquid sallies are much more frequent than those of tennis.

The Second Richest Girl

Ethel Crocker who went abroad with the Charley Clarks last week possesses a really marvellous voice that is to be cultivated in Paris. Incidentally there is to be a brilliant social season in the French capital for the San Francisco debutante under the wing of Princess Poniatowski. But Miss Crocker is a girl of ideas and these include other things beside dancing and drinking tea. She shares her mother's love of books and is extremely well read for a girl in her teens. The departure of Miss Crocker leaves Marguerite Doe the heiress of the winter. On her eighteenth birthday last year this favored young person assumed control of a fortune of $1,500,000 and there is more in prospect. She has worn some of the most striking costumes of the season. She has a white rabbit skin coat that envelopes her from head to heels and with which she wears a white fur cap that is particularly fetching. Another street costume is of royal blue velvet, the skirt edged with chinchilla and a small round hat of velvet and chinchilla. At the Greenway dance Monday night her gown was of dull pastel yellow chiffon combined with brown marabout. Miss Doe is petite and vivacious and is wholeheartedly enjoying her first season.

Two Interesting Newcomers

The two Stoney girls, Helena and Katherine, are late additions to the younger set. They arrived last month from the East where with their mother they have made their home for several years, and are at the Bellevue for the winter. Mrs. Stoney was a Babcock which is sufficient to insure her place in San Francisco society as well as in Baltimore and a few other places. Her husband was Captain Stoney of the navy. Mrs. Brigham is an aunt of the girls and their uncles are William and Harry Babcock. The relatives have entertained for them and although they have been out a season or two in the East and abroad the two Stoneys will go in for the fun of the younger crowd this season.

A Beloved Woman's Death

Distinguished for her gentle courtesy, her gracious kindness, her generous-hearted charity, Mrs. Miranda Weller made life better worth the living for many suffering souls and died full of years and rich in treasures of accomplishment to be widely mourned and poignantly missed. Her years in San Francisco embraced all the years of this city's history, but her beneficent achievements found their most fitting monument in the hearts of those she loved and helped. The city is poorer by her passing away. Formal history will tell that she was the widow of Colonel Charles L. Weller and that she came here with her husband in 1852 to help him win a position of distinction, but it is only in the intimate chronicles of charity that her worth will be adequately recorded. Two daughters, Mrs. Edwin Stevens and Mrs. Laura Cropper, and a grandson, Malcolm Cropper, are receiving the condolence of a wide circle of friends in their bereavement.

An Interesting Wedding

An interesting wedding will take place on Friday evening, December 2, when Miss Christine Judah, only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Raymond Judah, will be married to Dr. Chester Linwood Roadhouse. The ceremony will be performed by Rev. William A. Brewer of San Mateo at the home of the bride's brother, Mr. Floyd Judah, 308 Twelfth avenue, at eight o'clock. Only relatives and intimate friends will be present. Mrs. Floyd Judah will be matron of honor, Miss Dita Belknap will attend as maid of honor, and Miss Helen Pennell and Miss Gladys Roadhouse will serve as bridesmaids. Alexander Stoddard will be best man. Sentiment prompted Miss Judah in choosing the date for her wedding, for her father will on that evening celebrate his thirty-eighth year of service with the Southern Pacific. His uncle, the late Theodore Judah, was the civil engineer who built the Central Pacific and who died before the road was completed. Another mark of deep sentiment is the fact that the mother and father of the bride will have been married thirty-nine years on the wedding date. Mrs. Judah was Miss Julia Gelston, daughter of a naval officer who commanded one of the ships of the fleet that came here with Colonel Stevenson. The Judah family is one of the most prominent in the state. Miss Judah inherits the quick keen mind of her father; she is a cultured young girl and extremely popular. Dr. Roadhouse is a Cornell graduate and while at college was a noted athlete. The wedding will be marked by quiet elegance. After a short wedding tour the bride and groom will reside at 2531 Buena Vista way, Berkeley, Dr. Roadhouse being connected with the University.

The Braslan Musicale in San Jose

One of the most interesting social events of the season in San Jose occurred last week when Major and Mrs. Charles P. Braslan invited a large and fashionable assemblage to hear Mr. Bert Wirtz play at the Hotel Vendome. The Braslans are splendid hosts and the occasion was a brilliant one. Mr. Wirtz is known everywhere in the world of music as a great cello player and is soon to resume his professorship at the Peabody Conservatory in Baltimore, having recently completed a concert tour of the world. It was on account of his warm friendship for Major and Mrs. Braslan that the concert was arranged. Bach, Mozart, Boccherini and Saint Saens were among the masters interpreted and the exquisite rendition of his program won for Mr. Wirtz the most enthusiastic applause.

A Concert by Miss Cowles

Miss Cecil Cowles, assisted by Miss Helen Colburn Heath, will give a concert at Century Hall on Tuesday evening, November 22. The feature will be the rendition of a number of Miss Cowles' original songs, Miss Heath singing and Miss Cowles presiding at the piano. The songs to be given are founded on the Rubaiyat. In addition Miss Cowles will give numbers from Mendelssohn, Rachmaninoff and Schumann. The patronesses include: Mrs. Phoebe Hearst, Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Mrs. Eugene De Sabla, Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels, Mrs. Leon Sloss, Mrs. James Otis, Mrs. Fred McNear, Mrs. Jessie Lilienthal, Mrs. Fred Zeile, Mrs. James Shea and Mrs. I. N. Walter.

Miss Brandt's Concert

Miss Enid Brandt, who recently returned from Berlin where she played with great success with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, will give her first concert at the Novelty Theater, November 23, at eight o'clock. The magnificent Tschai-kowsky concerto will be her opening number, the accompanist being Mrs. Noah Brandt who has been her only instructor.

Miss Howard's Concert

Miss Eula Howard, the brilliant young artist who has become known all over the Pacific Coast as a Chopin interpreter, will conclude her northern tour this week. She is to give a concert at Century Club Hall on Wednesday evening, November 30, and great interest is being shown in the event by musical and society people. Miss Howard is among the most successful of the younger concert performers and this season she has been offered many engagements.

Miss Margaretta Brooke, who came up with a group of Portland friends to attend the wedding of her uncle, Thomas Scott Brooke, and Miss Christine Pomeroy, was the guest of honor at a charming luncheon given at the Palace by Miss Harriett Stone at which a dozen or more girls were present.

A DAINY TOILET ARTICLE

Every lady who desires to keep up her attractive appearance, while at the Theatre, attending Receptions, when shopping, while traveling and on all occasions should carry in her purse a booklet of Gouraud's Oriental Beauty Leaves. This is a dainty little booklet of exquisitely perfumed powdered leaves which are easily removed and applied to the skin. It is invaluable when the face becomes moist and flushed and is far superior to a powder puff as it does not spill and soil the clothes.

It removes dirt, soot and grease from the face, imparting a cool delicate bloom to the complexion. Sent anywhere on receipt of 10 cents in stamps or coin. F. T. Hopkins, 37 Great Jones St., New York.

SMITH BROS. STATIONERS OAKLAND

Mr. Faversham in "The World and His Wife"

By Edward F. O'Day

wonder whether Jose Echegaray got the inspiration for "The World and His Wife" from the Barber of Seville? As the plot of the fine play which Mr. William Faversham, Miss Julie Opp and their good company are presenting at the Savoy, was unfolded before my wrapt mind could not help thinking of the song which Don Basilio, the music master, sings in Rossini's opera. It is the song of calumny and it tells how the whisper that murders reputation begins like the sigh of a zephyr so soft that it scarcely stirs the drooping flowers; how the whisper becomes a voice that with many a serpent-wreathing finds its passage to the mind, bedimmed the senses and firing the brain; how, passing from tongue to tongue, it gains new strength as it sweeps along till like the tempest howling through the forest, it shakes the soul with fear; and how at length, as the earthquake rocks the earth, calumny in its most awful form brings ruin, wreck and death. This song describes so accurately the tragedy of calumny which Echegaray has made into a play that it is easy to imagine him listening to some Spanish basso thundering Rossini's words and being filled at once with the inspiration of "The World and His Wife." If modern plays had prologues Don Basilio's song could serve perfectly as a prologue to Echegaray's play. Not that "The World and His Wife" needs one. It is sufficient unto itself just as it stands. The false report that is flying through Madrid and blasting the good name of a faithful and loving wife fills the atmosphere of the theater almost from the beginning and has a local habitation besides in two of the characters whose evil minds engender fresh suspicions so fast that the innocence of their victims is overwhelmed and well-nigh destroyed. Echegaray's mind has that magic cast that we are used to associating with Spanish genius, so his play has its ending in death. Calumny does its work effectively and is no doubt convinced by the denouement that its whisperings were entirely true. Having murdered the weakest of its victims it throws the stronger survivors into each other's arms and probably closes the incident with a smirking "I told you so" and hurries after other prey. We seem to be asked to draw the inference that the staunchest innocence cannot resist calumny's deadly onslaught. In other hands the catastrophe might have borne less heavily on our sensibilities;

the tale might have been adorned in sunnier colors and the moral would have been pointed none the less; but let us not on that account quarrel with "The World and His Wife." It is a good play and we should be duly thankful; the more so because it is so well acted. From Mr. Faversham we have come to expect good acting and he has yet to disappoint us. As the volume of Don Basilio's Song of Calumny mounts steadily from piano to fortissimo, so Mr. Faversham's acting which at the beginning is easy and subdued, by degrees gains in power and intensity until at the end he seems to sweep us off our feet by his outburst of stored-up passion. And yet the climax comes long before the end when, at the close of the second act, he rushes from the stage with such a look of concentrated fury as I have rarely seen on the face of an actor. That look prefigures all that is to happen in the last act. Miss Julie Opp has a fine opportunity in the first act when she is first made aware of the malicious gossip that has assailed her good name. The slowness of the guiltless mind to grasp the hinted aspersion, the shock of understanding, the indignation of the first denial and the pride in which innocence takes refuge were all unerringly simulated. In the later scenes where the emotions of the character are less complicated but more stressful Miss Opp always found the right note.

To realize how her part ought not to be played one need only picture Mrs. Leslie Carter or Miss Margaret Illington or Miss Margaret Anglin playing it. She is forceful without their tumult, emotional without their breasty heavings, sad without their bathos and sympathetic without their sentimentality. The rest of the cast give performances that never jar.

The Liza Lehmann Concert

Mme. Liza Lehmann, the famous composer, and her splendid quartet of English singers, will give their farewell concert this Sunday afternoon, November 20, at the Columbia Theater. The program will be a charming one: Part one—Song Cycle, "The Breton Folk Songs," consisting of a trio, quartets and solos; the lyrics being by Frances M. Gostling. In part two Mr. Julien Henry, baritone, will sing "The Mad Dog" from "The Vicar of Wakefield;" Miss Blanche Tomlin, soprano, will offer "The Bird Songs;" Mr. Hubert Eisdell, tenor, has chosen a number from "The Golden Threshold: An Indian Song-Garland;" and Miss Palgrave Turner, the contralto, will interpret the "Two Seal Songs" from Kipling's "Jungle Book." Part three will consist of a humorous set of songs called "Four Cautionary Tales and a Moral."

Second Week of Blanche Walsh

The second and final week of the Blanche Walsh engagement will commence with this Sunday night's performance of "The Other Woman." There will be a special holiday matinee on Thanksgiving Day at which special prices will prevail. The regular Saturday matinee will also be given. An event of the season is booked for Monday night, November 28, when Lillian Russell opens for a fortnight with her latest stage hit, called "In Search of a Sinner." There is room for local pride to play about this piece as it was written for Miss Russell's tour by Charlotte Thompson, a former member of newspaper and literary circles in San Francisco.

The concerts will be given in Dreamland Rink, as this is the only place in San Francisco large enough to accommodate the thousands who will want to welcome back "our discovery." The dates will be Tuesday and Thursday nights and Saturday afternoon, December 6, 8 and 10. Prices on the lower floor will be $3, $2 and $1.50 and all will be reserved. The balcony will not be reserved and tickets will be $1. No more tickets will be sold than there is space to seat people in. The sale will open at Sherman, Clay and Co.'s Wednesday, November 30, but mail orders may now be sent to Will L. Greenbaum at Sherman, Clay and Co.'s.

De Wolfe Hopper at the Savoy

This Saturday afternoon and evening William Faversham will present "The World and His Wife" for the last times at the Savoy and on Sunday night will come "A Matinee Idol" in which Mr. Hopper who is a great favorite here and has not been seen in this city for some time, comes with the same company by which he was supported during the New York run of the piece. The organization is headed by blonde and beautiful Louise Dresser than whom no more delightful comedienne can be found. There is also a chorus of very lovely young women.

"Girls" at the Alcazar

"Girls," the last comedy written by the late Clyde Fitch, will be the Alcazar's attraction during the coming week, commencing Monday night and including a Thanksgiving Day matinee. It was presented in the Van Ness Theater about two years ago when press and public pronounced it the drollest analysis of feminine character ever constructed by the playwright to whom woman's mind seemed to be an open book. Elizabeth Stewart, Bessie Barriscale, Grace Barbour, Adele Belgarde, Thurston Hall, Thomas Chatterton, Will R. Walling, Burt Wesner and Louis Bennison will be in the cast.

The Pavlowa and Mordkin Russian Ballet

The Imperial Russian Ballet Company, headed by Anna Pavlowa and Mikail Mordkin and accompanied by a complete orchestra of players from the Metropolitan Opera House under the direction of Herr Stier, will commence its engagement at the Valencia Theater next Monday night, November 21, and remain for six nights with matinees on Thursday (Thanksgiving Day), Saturday and Sunday. Two different programs will be given. On Monday, Wednesday and Friday nights and at the Thursday and Saturday matinees "The Arabian Nights," an Oriental ballet in one act, will be given, in addition to eight great ensemble and solo dancing numbers, and Pavlowa and Mordkin will offer their famous "pas-de-deux." On Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoon the two-act romantic ballet, "Giselle" (Les Sylphides), an act from Delibes' "Coppelia," and four miscellaneous works will be the offering.

Attractions at the Orpheum

The Six Musical Cuttys, brothers and sisters who hold a high place among America's musical vaudeville artists, will make their first appearance at the Orpheum next week. James Callahan and Jenny St. George, two Irish-Americans, will present a little classic called "The Old Neighborhood." D. J. Andree's Studies in Porcelain, a series of Dresden art and ivory statues, will prove a distinct and highly artistic novelty. The Temple Quartette, a singing four, are also included in the good things of next week. Next week will be the last of Alf Grant and Ethel Hoag, Jewell's Manikins and the Great Asahi and his troupe of Japanese. It will also conclude the engagement of George Beban in "The Sign of the Rose."

"Blue Jeans" at Ye Liberty

The Thanksgiving week attraction of the Bishop Players at Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland, will be "Blue Jeans," Joseph Arthur's celebrated comedy-drama. This play, with its interesting plot, clever, wholesome fun and quaint and witty dialogue should make a splendid vehicle for the transbay stock players, especially as it can be given such an effective scenic production on Ye Liberty's big revolving stage. There will be a special holiday matinee on Thanksgiving Day. "The Battle" is announced to follow.

Ellen Terry's Coming

Although the advance sale of seats for the Ellen Terry matinee at the Columbia does not commence until next Saturday morning, the inquiry for reservations is the largest in a long time. The great English actress is coming here for one performance only and that will take place on the afternoon of Thursday, December 1. Miss Terry will give a program called "Shakespeare's Heroines Triumphant" and the discourse will be offered with illustrative acting.

Letters

A Thriller and Well Written

Undoubtedly the mysterious disappearance of Society's jewels when only Society's elect has been within reach of them has furnished Mr. Frederick S. Isham with the theme for his "Social Buccaneer." The society thief has been a favorite subject during late years but none the less "The Social Buccaneer" is an interesting and well written story which holds the reader to the end. Though the main action takes place within a few days and a limited circumference its ramifications lead through social and benevolent circles, into the business world and the Chinese quarters, with glimpses of the workings of the Oriental secret societies and the long and strong arm which they can stretch out. It takes in not only American aristocracy but some of the British as well, with Chinese, half castes, merchants and pirates and though the attentive reader can almost see the end from the beginning there are times when one is reminded of the old game of "Who's got the button?" The Buccaneer was an exemplary young man, the son of a missionary, who, apparently inheriting a large fortune from some unadvertised source, lived frugally on the income he earned as a clerk in an importing house and devoted his large means to charity. Inspired by the example of a benevolent Chinese "pirate" far up on one of the interior rivers, who, in a season of famine, seized the hoarded grain at sword's point and distributed it amongst the starving people, Chatfield Bruce had conceived the Quixotic scheme of righting wrongs in the same illegal manner. He was really an exemplary young man, save for this curious twist in his brain, and being beyond the range of suspicion, he was able, for a considerable while, to force some restitution from the law-protected rascals who preyed on their poorer victims. One might almost call Bruce an honest thief. His courage, both mental and physical, was more than once put to the test, and the coolness by which he managed to elude his pursuers when he seemed to be actually within their grasp forces one's admiration. He is so clever that, had he turned his attention to buccaneering on his private account there is no doubt that he would have been a captain of that industry, and yet, withal, though one knows his hands have actually closed on the loot, it is hard to reconcile his general character with the fact. The traits of Oriental loyalty and vindictiveness are well brought out and though, of course, it is more or less of a love story, there is no philandering to interrupt the movement of the more absorbing interest. It is a foregone conclusion that whatever happens to postpone the event Marion Wood and Chatfield Bruce are intended for each other. "The Social Buccaneer" is one of the best stories of its kind. From the Bobbs-Merrill Company.

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—The sharp break in the stock market beginning with the first day after the election was a surprise to a considerable speculative contingent who were looking for higher figures from the favorable election results. In view of the extensive rise in prices previous to this event it was not expected that further enhancement in values would occur at this moment with a delicate position in the money market and the railway rate situation at Washington uncompleted. It was this disappointment that caused heavy professional selling in the later days of the week. It can be said that on the declines to the low figure reached, influential buying in leading stocks occurred and in sufficient volume to warrant the belief that bankers are well satisfied with the general conditions of the country politically and otherwise and that with the further advancement of the railroad rate difficulty toward settlement, we may expect to see a resumption of the upward trend in values. Of course it can be admitted that there are a number of fundamentals that remain unsatisfactory for any great market activity that would create public interest at the moment. Nevertheless these are not factors of such import as to preclude a fair rise in securities toward the close of the year. Weak points in Wall Street have been well cleaned up and leading banking institutions are the chief holders of securities and unless something unforeseen happens we may look for continuous stability here and betterment later on. There is nothing new in the copper situation. The copper stocks were inclined to follow the lead of the big market. At the close of the week, London was reported as a big buyer of Amalgamated and the general outlook is more favorable from the metal standpoint.

Wheat—As a result of a week's hard fighting on the part of the most influential and resourceful interests in the local wheat trade, there were advances from the low point of November of 3-8 cents for December, 31-4 cents for May and 21-4 cents for July wheat. If there was any improvement for cash wheat or flour demand that could be traced to the rally in prices it was hard to locate. The improvement noted in the southwest was due to the movement out of Kansas City of considerable hard wheat, to be milled east of the Lakes this winter, which was being hurried forward to anticipate the exceptionally early closing of Lake navigation. Present favoring influences for the holder and believer in higher prices are few and thus far at least need vigorous arguments to support them. The chief obstacle to a rising market however is the very limited volume of business running.

rived at through ordinary trade sources. With the carry over of 119,000,000 bushels there is a total corn supply of about 3,240,000,000 bushels or about 390,000,000 bushels more than were available at this time last year. It will require but very small marketings from this big crop to keep all trade channels full and the market weighted down.

Cotton—The cotton market during the past week has been in the control of the professional element and was a choppy affair with a little heaviness shown at the end of the week. It is probable that the acute political controversy in England which is causing a decline in British government securities is beginning to have some influence on the Liverpool market and this feature will bear close watching. The price of cotton is so high, when compared with recent years, that anything unfavorable to the monetary markets of Europe would quickly unsettle the world's future markets. The following figures will prove interesting in connection with the next census report which will be issued at the opening next Monday, November 21: Ginned to November 1, 1909, 7,017,849 bales; 1908, 8,191,557; 1907, 6,128,562; 1906, 6,903,395. Ginned to November 14, the same years, 8,112,199; 9,595,809; 7,300,665. Total for period 1909, 1,094,350; 1908, 1,404,252; 1907, 1,172,103; 1906, 1,655,849. In order to equal the largest ginning on record for the period, the report would only have to show a total of 8,995,830 bales but as there are only eleven working days in the period this year against twelve days last year, it is probable that the report will not exceed 8,700,000 bales which figures would indicate the second largest amount ginned to November 14 on record and cause more consideration to be given to a 12,500,000 bales crop estimate.

Local Securities—There are few fresh developments in the local stock and bond situation for the past week or so. The general list continues to maintain the same firm front with a rather small amount of transactions. California Wine stocks are in active demand through rumors that the preferred will start paying dividends early next year. Pacific Gas and Electric stocks still hover around record prices and have every indication of going higher. Associated Oil and Spring Valley are rather neglected and by their own weight appear to be heavy. Of the balance little can be said outside of the fact that there does not appear to be any selling pressure in any of the issues and when times are right a general advance seems certain.

ple, released from those restrictions, will always find means of apportioning the land by common consent, in such a way that everyone will have an equal share of the benefits the use of the land confers.

It is only necessary for the majority of landowners—that is slaveowners—to understand, as they did in the matter of serfdom, that property in land is as hard on the present-day slaves, and as great an iniquity on the part of the slaveowners, as serfdom was; and, having understood that, it is only necessary for them to impress on the Government the necessity of repealing the laws sanctioning property in land: that is, land-slavery. One would have thought that, as in the 'fifties the best members of society (chiefly the serf-owning nobles themselves), having understood the criminality of their position, explained to the Government the necessity for abolishing their evidently out-of-date and immoral rights, and serfdom was abolished; so it should be now, with regard to private property in land, which is land-slavery.

But strange to say, the present slaveowners, the landed proprietors, not only fail to see the criminality of their position, and do not impress on the Government the necessity of abolishing land-slavery, but on the contrary they consciously and unconsciously, by all manner of means, blind themselves and their slaves to the criminality of their position.

The reasons of this are: first, that serfdom in the 'fifties, being the plain, downright enslavement of man by man, ran too clearly counter to religious and moral feeling; while land-slavery is not a direct, immediate slavery, but is a form of slavery more hidden from the slaves, and especially from the slaveowners, by complicated

Governmental, social and economic institutions. And the second reason is that, while in the days of serfdom only one class were slaveowners, all classes, except the most numerous one—consisting of peasants who have too little land, laborers and workingmen—are slaveowners now. Nowadays nobles, merchants, officials, manufacturers, professors, teachers, authors, musicians, painters, rich peasants, rich men's servants, well-paid artisans, electricians, mechanics, etc., are all slaveowners of the peasants who have insufficient land, and of the unskilled workmen who—apparently as a result of most varied causes, but in reality as a result of one cause alone (the appropriation of land by the landed proprietors)—are obliged to give their labor and even their lives to these who possess the advantages land affords. These two reasons, that the new slavery is less evident than the old, and that the new slaveowners are much more numerous than the old ones, account for the fact that the slaveowners of our day do not see, and do not admit, the cruelty and criminality of their position, and do not free themselves from it.

The slaveowners of our day not only do not admit that their position is criminal, and do not try to escape from it, but are quite sure that property in land is a necessary institution, essential to the social order, and that the wretched condition of the working classes—which they cannot help noticing—results from most varied causes, but certainly not from the recognition of some people's right to own land as private property.

This opinion of landowning, and of the causes of the wretched condition of the laborers, is so well established in all the leading countries of the Christian world, France, England, Germany, America, etc., that with very rare exceptions it never occurs to their public men to look in the right place for the cause of the wretched condition of the workers.

That is so in Europe and America; but one would have expected that for us Russians, with our hundred-million peasant population who deny the principle of private ownership in land and with our enormous tracts of land, and with the almost religious desire of our people for agricultural life, an answer very different from the general European answer to questions as to the causes of the distress among the workers, and as to the means of bettering their position, would naturally present itself.

One would think that we Russians might understand that if we really are concerned about and desire to improve, the position of the people and to free them from the aggravating and demoralizing fetters with which they are bound the means to do this is indicated both by common sense and by the voice of the people, and is simply—the abolition of private property in land, that is to say, the abolition of land-slavery.

But strange to relate, in Russian society, occupied with questions of the improvement of the condition of the working classes, there is no suggestion of this one, natural, simple and self-evident means of improving their condition. We Russians, though our peasants' outlook on the land-question is probably centuries ahead of the rest of Europe, can devise nothing better for the improvement of our people's condition than to establish among ourselves, on the European model, Doumas, Councils, Ministries, Courts Zemstvos, Universities, Extension Lectures Academies, Elementary Schools, Fleets, Submarines, Air-ships, and many other of the queerest things quite foreign to and unnecessary for the people, and we do not do the one thing that is demanded by religion, morality and common sense, as well as by the whole of the peasantry

88 FIRST STREET

Nor is this all. While arranging the fate of our people, who do not and never did acknowledge land-ownership, we, imitating Europe, try in all sorts of cunning ways, and by deception, bribery, and even force, to accustom them to the idea of property in land: that is to say, we try to deprave them and to destroy their consciousness of the truth that has held for ages, and which sooner or later will certainly be acknowledged by the whole human race: the truth that all who live on the earth cannot but have an equal right to its use.

These efforts to inoculate the people with the idea of landed property that is so foreign to them, are unceasingly made, with great perseverance and zeal by the Government, and consciously or for the most part unconsciously, from an instinct of self-preservation, by all the slaveholders of our time. And the slaveholders of our time are not the landowners alone, but are those who, as a result of the people being deprived of the land, enjoy power over them.

POSTER DESIGN FOR THE OAKLAND

Most strenuous efforts are made to deprave the people, but, thank God; it may be safely said that till now all those efforts have only had an effect on the smallest and worst part of Russia's peasant population. The many millions majority of Russian workmen who hold but little land and live—not the depraved, parasitic life of the slaveowners, but their own reasonable, hard-working lives—do not yield to those efforts, because for them the solution of the land question is not one of personal advantage, as it is regarded by all the different slaveowners of today. For the enormous majority of peasants, the solution of that problem is not arrived at by mutually contradictory economic theories that spring up today and tomorrow are forgotten, but is found in the one truth, which is realized by them and always has been and is realized by all reasonable men the world over—the truth that all men are brothers, and have therefore all an equal right to all the blessings of the world, and among the rest, to the most necessary of all rights, namely the equal right of all to the use of the land.

Living in this truth, an enormous majority of the peasants attach no importance to all the wretched measures adopted by the Government about this or that alteration of the laws of land-ownership, for they know that there is only one solution to the land question: the total abolition of private property in land, and of land-slavery. And knowing this, they quietly await their day, which sooner or later must come.

Auto Notes

A forty-eight hour endurance run will be one of the big features during Automobile Show week in Oakland. This was decided at a meeting of the Oakland Automobile Dealers' Association under whose auspices the first 1911 show will be held at Idora Park during Thanksgiving week. A dozen dealers on both sides of the bay have already pledged entries for the contest. It is proposed to start the event, which will be run as the Oakland Auto Show Endurance Test, at 10 p. m. on Saturday, the opening night of the big exposition at Idora. The machines will be sent away under a two minute schedule. The course will be over the San Leandro triangle and the cars will check out at Idora Park after the first 24 hours and at the finish of the run.

W. D. Vance, secretary of the Bay Cities Electric Co., plans to have one of the most elaborate exhibits in the show. Talking of the cars he has coming on the special automobile train, he said, "We will have on exhibition one Model 1220

C. J. HEESEMAN

Member of the Oakland Automobile Show Committee.

Columbus Electric Broughm; one Model 1002 Columbus Electric Coupe; one Model 1202 four-passenger Coupe with chain in oil drive; one Model 1200 four-passenger Stanhope, chain in oil drive. All of these cars are representative of the new 1911 models being gotten out by the Columbus Buggy Company."

A feature of the show will be the display of commercial vehicles. These conveyances will add an entirely new interest to automobile exhibits in this section as only pleasure cars have heretofore found space in shows on the Pacific Coast. During the past season a large list of the most prominent American-made trucks have been introduced to the local market. A large number of these have been assigned space at the Oakland show, among them being the Alco, Auto-car, Frayne-Miller, Grabowsky, Gramm and Buick.

The most completely equipped and modern police patrol ever designed for an American city is that being finished at the E. R. Thomas Motor Company's plant in Buffalo, N. Y., for the City of Lowell, Mass. The big machine is really a combination first-aid car, ambulance and general police conveyance, and with its speed and equipment would do credit to a city many times the size of Lowell.

Miss Irene Broucher of Carson City probably deserves credit for being one of the most competent chauffeurs on the Pacific Coast. She purchased a Pope-Hartford car about four months ago, and after a few days' instructions she drove the car with her father and other members of the family to Carson City via Placerville, Tallac and the Kinsberry mountains.

One of the most elegant catalogues issued by the automobile trade for the 1911 season is that published by the Chalmers Motor Car Co. of Detroit. This catalogue which contains about 40 pages is beautifully illustrated in colors. One of the most interesting features is a series of pictures taken of the Chalmers which won the trophy on the Glidden route.

Col. H. Weinstock, president of the Weinstock, Nichols Co., is visiting Los Angeles where Weinstock, Nichols have just taken over the Southern California branch of the Morgan & Wright Rubber Tire Co. and combined it with their general supply business at 216 South Olive street. This makes the Weinstock, Nichols concern sole representatives for the Morgan & Wright output in California, Nevada, Arizona and Hawaii.

S. G. Chapman reports that 42 Hupmobiles are now en route to this city from the factory and that there is advance demand for practically the whole lot. These large shipments include all the Hupmobiles types and will bring the torpedo body and four-passenger car here for the first time.

The much talked-of and much raced-for Vanderbilt Cup, trophy of the biggest automobile race run in America, is coming to the Pacific Coast for at least a portion of the winter. It is to be displayed at the Oakland Automobile Show which opens this Saturday night at Idora Park. This announcement comes from the office of Mayor Frank K. Mott of Oakland, through whose personal efforts the cup was secured for the show. The American Locomotive Company for whom Harry Grant won the cup this year in an Alco car is an exhibitor at the Oakland show as are four other companies which achieved distinction in the big event, the Marmon, Amplex, Buick and Pope-Hartford. The fact that machines of these makes will be among those exhibited adds to the interest occasioned by the presence of the cup itself.

Among the most recent deliveries of Haynes Cars is that just made by the Haynes Auto Sales Co. to Marshall A. Frank, the well-known insurance man. Another car of the same make has just been delivered to Smythe Brothers, the fire-proof contracting firm.

The Hudson 33

More completely than any other car has put the automobile on the basis of a practical utility.

Materials and construction as good as the best at a price low enough to come within the possibilities of the average business man is the secret of the Hudson's success.

Two Ways of Building a Low Priced Car

The most common way: First set the price and then build a car to come within the price.

THE HUDSON WAY: First build the car as well as materials and the best schooled experience in automobile construction will permit and then set the price as low as cost of building and marketing that car will justify.

That is why we say first in the Car and then in the Price the Hudson is the premier general utility car.

Letters

"The Flying Mercury"

"The Flying Mercury" is the second book by the author of "The Flying Mercury," whose "The Flying Mercury" is so short as to be really only a novella. The characters are few, the action spirited and the author has shown unusual discrimination in resisting any desire to pad it out to length, for its strength lies largely in concentration. There is a pompous old father with an only motherless son who inherited more life from one side of the family than dignity from the other, and when the boy was expelled from college for a bit of mischief, though it would seem as though he must have been unusually studious to have attained seniorhood at the age of twenty-one, he was, likewise, expelled from the paternal roof and heart. In his place were taken a nephew and a niece, parentless children of other brothers. The Ffrenches were the manufacturers of the Mercury car, but from the attitude of Ethan Ffrench towards everything save the profits of the business, it is difficult to understand how the place had ever succeeded, for apparently he despised the practical work of a mechanic as something too low for a gentleman to understand. The nephew, Dick Ffrench, at the age of twenty-three, was a typical gilded youth in all save experience in vice, but unsatisfactory as he was, he was at least a "gentleman," and since it was obvious that he would never amount to a pin as a factor in the business it devolved on his cousin Emily to marry a substitute, to discover somewhere, a "gentleman" who would be socially all that her uncle Ethan demanded and yet have at his finger tips the whole art and science, theory and practice of automobile engineering and the general manager of making sales. With a man like Ethan Ffrench at the head of affairs it is easy to perceive that, despite the efforts of the junior partner and manager the Mercury car was not cutting any great figure in the world of wheels. Enters now upon the scene the ideal man, one "Darling" Lestrangle, a racing driver, with his mechanic, Rupert, the one supplementing the other and between them making the Mercury car a success. Their association comes through an accident involving the car at night where a punctured tire and an unsteady driver left Lestrangle in a precarious position. Emily Ffrench from an unpleasant situation, being rescued by Lestrangle, found a more congenial situation than that of racer. Lestrangle was pleased to accept a position as manager of the Ffrench firm.

where, without having met him, Ethan Ffrench developed an animosity towards the efficient employee which could have its root in nothing but disappointment that none of his own blood was capable of undertaking the work so well done by this stranger. Lestrangle not only took the factory in hand but likewise Master Dick, and was rapidly making him over into a real man, having first won the irresponsible youth's heart (as well as that of his cousin Emily), when an accidental meeting between him and the self-satisfied elder Ffrench precipitated the catastrophe, for "D." Lestrangle, affectionately nicknamed "Darling" by everyone who knew him because of his sunny, affectionate disposition, his frankness and fairness was, of course, the disowned David Ffrench, honestly trying his level best to work out in his life a course that would lead to reconciliation while Ethan, still so self-righteous that he could neither look nor listen to anything save his own point of view, again turns his son from his door, only to learn that his sarcasms and vituperations have been directed against the man who has put his factory at the head of the list and that his son had never been guilty of the accusations made against him. There are some fine passages of description and some thrilling moments in the big automobile race with which the story closes. Lestrangle is one of those level-headed lovable characters that one never finds in life though one always hopes to. He wins his successes not by hair-brained escapades but by clean, clever, pretty work, and there is nothing cheap in the heroism which ties him, partially disabled, to the wheel for nineteen hours out of loyalty to a contract with a man who cannot play fair. One does not grudge the reconciliation which comes about and one feels the better for having read the story. The Bobbs-Merrill Company have made a very pretty book of "The Flying Mercury," with page decorations by Bertha Stuart and illustrations in color by Edmund Frederick.

The Faithful Reporter

"There is no person to whom I would rather tell a secret than a newspaperman. He will go out of his way to keep it; he will lock it in the depths of his bosom, and keep it until seventy times seven. New System of Fat Reduction

The saying that there is nothing new under the sun does not now apply to fat people. Here is something new for them: a new sensation, a new pleasure, a new and graceful figure, easily found by anyone who is having trouble with the fatness of excess. Everyone has heard of the Marmola Prescription, that harmless combination of fat-reducing elements discovered by one of our foremost physicians. Now, from the same high authority, there comes another step in the way of procuring these same harmless ingredients in a pleasant form: tablets. Taken after eating and at bedtime, they help the stomach to dispose of its fat load, preventing from its contact with flesh, muscle and bones, without need of exercise. Marmola Prescription Tablets reduce the entire system—the very system of fat, exerting no additional strain on the fat-laden system, as given by the body. You can prove all this at a trifling cost. Marmola Prescription Tablets are sold by all druggists or sent by mail to the Marmola Company, 1000 Market Ave., San Francisco. A large case—sufficient to bring lasting results—costs but 75 cents.

What Mrs. Barker Found at Thousand Oaks

"I had looked at every residence district within a radius of 15 miles of San Francisco and decided on Thousand Oaks as soon as I saw it.

"Being a lover of nature, I am impressed with this delightful spot as soon as Mr. Newell showed me the property."

"I cannot imagine one wanting to live on a straight treeless street shut in from the view of our great bay, when such a place as Thousand Oaks is on the market at such reasonable prices.

"The giant oaks, the moss covered rocks, the little triangle parks, the unobstructed marine view, the build-

You, who are reading this announcement, should have your home here.

Right now, before the Southern Pacific's electric trains start running you can purchase a homesite in Thousand Oaks from $25 to $35 a front foot; one-tenth down and one per cent a month with no interest nor taxes for two years.

An indicator shows the amount of oil in the font. Filler-cap does not screw on; but is put in like a cork in a bottle, and is attached by a chain. An automatic-locking flame spreader prevents the wick from being turned high enough to smoke, and is easy to remove and drop back so that it can be cleaned in an instant.

Cruel and Inhuman Punishment

In this topsy-turvy world it often happens that what brings sunshine to the soul of one man brings gloom to the heart of another. We saw an exemplification of this phenomenon last week when Mr. Heney was made the ostensible motif of a love-feast at which the prevailing sentiment was that the people should be felicitated on a consummation that was conclusive of the regeneration of the city. This consummation was the election of the Hon. Hiram Johnson. It was taken for granted that Mr. Johnson's election proved that the people had come to their senses, and that the graft prosecution had not been in vain. Apparently none of the banqueters perceived that in making this proposition serve as a pretext for jubilation they grievously wounded the feelings of several distinguished patriots for whom they ought to have the profoundest compassion. To none of them did it occur that in interpreting Mr. Johnson's election as evidence of the awakening of the people and of their ability to differentiate the worthy from the unworthy they suggested a very uncomplimentary and cruel conclusion with reference to such men as the Hon. William P. Lawlor, the Hon. Barclay Henley and the Hon. Walter Macarthur. These illustrious gentlemen are representatives of the same cause with which Mr. Johnson has been identified. They labored heroically for the success of that cause, they incurred contumely and reproach in defense of it, and when they appealed to the suffrages of the people it was with the expectation of being rewarded for their services. But their expectation was disappointed. In the circumstances it was impossible for them to enter into the spirit of the love-feast, much less to enter into sympathy with the paramount sentiment, which must be construed as nothing short of an insult to the distinguished trio. And to Judge Lawlor, especially, it must have been exceedingly galling; for Judge Lawlor had the misfortune to run behind his ticket and also behind his four confreres of the bench. To suffer defeat was bad enough, but how harrowing to his emotions to be told by his friends, by the men who procured his attendance at that memorable midnight meeting, that the people by whom he was repudiated had been regenerated and become zealous for good government! Judge Lawlor himself never inflicted more cruel or more inhuman punishment on any of the poor wretches that from time to time have appealed to him in vain for mercy.

Time's Generosity

The simultaneous reappearance in this country of those two aged and talented women, Ellen Terry and Sara Bernhardt, has occasioned reflection on their wonderful durability. It seems to be regarded as most remarkable that they should have grown old so gracefully, that Time, the greatest of all tyrants, should have dealt with them so gently. They have certainly worn exceedingly well, but other women have woven the warp of life not less successfully than they. Indeed as yet they have hardly approximated the record of Ninon De L'Enclos, the most beautiful woman of the seventeenth century, who, at the age of 85 was pronounced by Louis XV the marvel of his reign. She not only retained her faculties unimpaired, but her charms of person also. For seventy years she held undisputed sway over the hearts of men, and after passing the three-score-years-and-ten period she was writing love letters to Saint-Evremond, to whom she explained that her long and vigorous life was due to her unflagging observance of the principles of the Epicurean philosophy. Not less remarkable than the beautiful Ninon for her resistance of the frigidity of age was La Montansier who was a girl when the marvel of the reign of Louis XV was an octogenarian. We are told that there is nothing like serenity of temperament and freedom from anxiety to preserve beauty from the ravages of time; but La Montansier preserved hers in one of the most turbulent periods of history, during which she experienced vicissitudes of a most exasperating nature. A waif of the streets of Paris, she had a desperate struggle for existence until as a young woman she became one of the world's most successful adventuresses. Acquiring a third-rate actor for a lover she grew interested in theatricals, and in the reign of Louis XVI she was the owner of nearly all the leading theaters of France; and besides Marie Antoinette gave her the exclusive privilege of managing the balls and fetes at Versailles. During the Revolution she conducted a salon in Paris that was frequented by Barras, Robespierre, Danton and the Duc d'Orleans. Then came the Reign of Terror; and the Commune confiscated one of her theaters, and to silence her started her on the road to the guillotine, which was certainly enough to take the color out of her cheeks if not to corrugate her handsome brow. But the beautiful Montansier was not to be beheaded. From her prison cell she addressed the mob, and so great was her popularity that the terrorists themselves fearing the consequences of public indignation set her at liberty. At 65 this wonderful woman was the mistress of Barras and in the zenith of her beauty. Napoleon met her before he knew Josephine, and wooed and won her; but after an engagement of about two weeks the fickle Corsican changed his mind. Now Ninon De L'Enclos and La Montansier were certainly more to be marveled at than Sara Bernhardt and Ellen Terry for neither of whom will the rouge pot or the flask of peroxide avail against the will of nature. The two distinguished actresses may still captivate by their mimetic powers, but their physical charms have long since ceased to enthrall.

Leo Tolstoi

The late Count Leo Tolstoi was Russia's most eminent and benignant reformer, as well as the most distinguished man of letters whom she possessed since the death of Turgenieff, a quarter of a century ago. If we were justified in measuring an author's claim to long remembrance by the extent of his popularity during his lifetime, then it could be said with certainty that the author of "War and Peace" had no rival in the resplendent list of Russian novelists which began with Gogol. In the domain of fiction Tolstoi was both a realist and an idealist, but more of a preacher than either. In his later years he renounced the function of the novelist for that of the propagandist, a circumstance that caused many a critic to feel that a great artist was lost when the man who wrote "Anna Karenina" became a reformer; but what proved a loss to art was a gain to mankind. It was the spirit of the reformer that prompted Tolstoi to write what is perhaps the most valuable of all his works "What is Art?" In this book he gives us his views on the ideal in art. He teaches that art is not to flatter or amuse; that art is not the handmaid of pleasure but the herald of the soul. Flouting the theory of art for art's sake he argues that art should call forth nothing but the feeling of brotherhood and love, and he reflects with something of bitterness on the tendencies of the symbolists and decadents whose art, he says, has grown poor in material and has given itself up altogether to conveying the feelings of vanity, weariness of life, and, most of all, sexual desire. "Just as people," he says, "who hold the aim and destiny of food to be pleasure, cannot discover the true purpose of eating, so people who hold the aim of art to be pleasure cannot discover its purpose and destiny, because they ascribe an activity having its purpose in union with other manifestations of life, to the false and exclusive end of pleasure." Tolstoi played quite an important part in politics as in literature, but he was not, as many believe, the arch-revolutionary whose teaching inspired the agitators of Russia. Though he wielded considerable influence it was not of a nature dangerous to the government. His opinions were innocuous in that they touched at no point the actual objects of men whose aims were dangerous. His attacks on the Government had nothing specific in them. They might have been made on all Governments. No one derided more scornfully than he all progressives and their ideas of reform. Tolstoi was a dreamer, and for such dreams as his mankind should be grateful.

The Agitators of Mexico

It is interesting and instructive to observe the attitude of the American press toward the revolutionary movement in the so-called republic of Mexico. The leaders of this movement are presumably imbued with motives similar to those that actuated the men by whom the monarchy of Portugal was recently overthrown; but they are viewed by our press in a different light from that in which the Portuguese revolutionists were considered. The Portuguese revolutionists gave our American editors the impression that they were ardent patriots inspired with love of liberty, impatient of monarchical rule, and eager to throw off the shackles of tyranny and give their countrymen the blessings of liberty. But the Mexican revolutionists, singularly enough, have given the impression that they are mischievous agitators actuated by the most sordid and selfish motives. It appears that according to the philosophy of the American press a revolution to be respectable and virtuous must be directed against rank and unblushing royalty. We are to infer from the sentiments of our contemporaries that for a ruler to be a despot he must first acquire a crown and sit upon a throne; the form of government is everything, the manner in which government is administered is of no consequence. It follows therefore that what was patriotism in Portugal is treason in Mexico. And yet as everybody knows Diaz is to Mexico what Cromwell was to England and what Caesar was to Rome, only more so. Diaz, his American admirers tell us, is a benevolent ruler, entitled to the reverence and loyalty of his subjects. Yet Diaz has completely subverted the institutions of his country. He rules by virtue of the military rod, but he preserves order, and that is the sole test of efficiency. True the rich are growing richer and the poor are growing poorer, but nowhere does American capital receive so much encouragement as in Mexico, where valuable concessions are granted by Diaz to Americans who are able to guarantee him the friendship of this country and insure him against revolt of American sentiment. Conditions in Mexico are not vastly different from those in the Congo which have aroused world-wide indignation, but as there isn't much American capital in the Congo it is easy for us to yield our tender solicitude to the poor peons of that distant land; just as easy as to resent Mexican hostility to Americans for which there is no reason except that Yankee enterprise is rapidly getting a monopoly of all the good things in our sister Republic. No wonder that Mexican revolutionists are regarded in this country as nothing but mischievous agitators.

The Ethics of Criticism

By four correspondents, all expressing the same sentiments in similar terms, we are taken to task for describing an ex-President of the United States as a mountebank and a demagogue. By none of these correspondents are we reproached with bad taste for calling names. We are merely advised that a man who has been President of the United States is entitled to respectful treatment at the hands of American citizens, and that to visit personal abuse on one who has occupied that exalted office is outrageous. What warrant there is for this criticism none of our correspondents has deemed it necessary to disclose; but it suggests the possibility of there being at once a divinity that hedges ex-Presidents as well as sovereigns on their thrones and an unwritten law of lese-majesty that defines as treason the application of opprobrious terms to one who has served as chief magistrate of a republic. Of such we confess that we have never heard. We have yet to learn that there is anything in the way of principle or precedent that protects any servant of the people, or any ex-servant from just criticism. Surely Mr. Roosevelt himself, who has been so free with his epithets, and who has not hesitated to vituperate men of the most exalted station, will not claim immunity from criticism on any sentimental ground. He would certainly much prefer to be undeserving of harsh criticism than to be merely endowed with a special privilege of immunity. And likewise his critics would much rather be reproached with impropriety than with injustice. Now while we have not been called upon to defend ourselves against the charge of injustice, suspecting that our correspondents really believe that our estimate of Mr. Roosevelt is not in accordance with the facts, we will take occasion to insist to the contrary; for we must emphatically protest against the assumption that any man be he ever so humble is ever wantonly subjected to abusive criticism in these columns. And as to Mr. Roosevelt, how far we have been from doing him injustice, even the most dull-witted person may perceive by taking the trouble to inform himself, to learn some of the startling truths respecting salient incidents of his career. Perhaps the best available study of his career is that made by Mrs. Anne Riley Hale in her book "Rooseveltian Fact and Fable," an historical narrative written as the author says "without malice and without apology" and only as a result of her having marvelled at the swift ingenuity with which events "were wrested from their original setting and given a wholly different coloring from that they at first wore"; also, at "the celerity with which doings and sayings of the Strenuous President were hustled completely out of sight, and the public mind immediately occupied by other matters." In Mrs. Hale's book are some interesting chapters on San Juan and the Round Robin, on the dealings with Addicks, Quay, Platt and the labor leaders, on the intercourse with Harriman, on the ejection of Mrs. Minor Morris from the White House, on the Storer and many other incidents. Mrs.

Hale is now publishing a second edition of her book which is dedicated "To the Galleries, to whom my hero has played so long and so successfully." This illuminating book, though its chapters constitute a most severe indictment of our ex-President, has yet to be brought down to date. It does not deal with those incidents of his post-African journey which afforded many thousands of the unsophisticated their first glimpse of his real character, and, as a result, alienated their affections. The waning of Mr. Roosevelt's popularity began but a few months ago, though for several years he was engaged in doing the things that supplied Mrs. Hale with material for her book. Not the public merely but many honest and intelligent critics took him seriously in his White House days, and though they occasionally chided him they were always amiable. In their criticisms they never questioned his motives. But even these critics have revolted, and have become harsh in their animadversions. Take for example, the sober and dignified Springfield Republican which has told us since the election that observing men have seen that Mr. Roosevelt is "interested in his own power and fortunes rather than in his policies." What does this mean if it doesn't mean that he is both a demagogue and a mountebank? From the same journal we learn that in New York and elsewhere he waged a campaign "which for mendacity and ruthless inconsideration of the rights of others has never been surpassed in all the history of the republic." Furthermore: "To the treachery visited upon President Taft was added the brutality which sought to cover with deliberate misrepresentation and crush others who seemed to stand in his way." And again: "The dignity properly belonging to the ex-Presidential position was carried down into the mire of unscrupulous personal politics and made all possible use of to overwhelm opposition by the added power of misrepresentation and abuse." Surely in these columns no ex-President ever received a more bitter dose of personal abuse than that which the cleanest and most conservative family journal in America administered to Mr. Roosevelt. To be sure it is free from personal epithet, but it is all the more biting for that. If we prefer epithet we have but to go to the New York Sun any day in the week. On November 10 Mr. Roosevelt was characterized as "a baffled demagogue," as a "bold Dick Turpin," and the readers were told "that the election of Mr. Dix was due to one man's selfishness, egotism, greed of power, insincerity, low stooping, untruthfulness, humbug and ruffianism." From all of which it is evident that if there is any divinity or any unwritten law by which an ex-President is protected from just personal criticism, ignorance of the same is not confined to this journal.

A Kiss

I asked of one whom I loved full well:
"There is just one thing I would have you tell:
'Tis strange to ask, but the thing is this,
What is the good or the ill of a kiss?"

"It should be," she answered, "a sacred sign
Of a love that can follow the Great Design;
But e'en now to the devil your soul you may sell,
And a kiss may lead to heaven—or hell."

"You are right," I cried; "it may lead to bliss
Or may be, too, like the Traitor's Kiss.
So I learn your lesson. In direst drouth
No kisses of mine shall touch your mouth."

Perspective Impressions

The tramp who lived in San Jose on ten cents a day is a great ad. for the prune belt.

The Rev. C. Madison C. Peters recommends children to women as a cure for frivolity. Now let us find the frivolous woman who wishes to be cured.

Mary Garden says that gum chewing is ruinous to the voice. How does Mary know? Mary is one of those very beautiful women who can't have everything.

Some people seem to be of the opinion that public virtue is to be found where private is not.

Instead of jollyng ourselves any more about one golden enthusiasm for the World's Fair let us get busy at the seat of conflict. New Orleans hasn't been saying much, but she has been sawing considerable wood.

If patriots have not grown too shrewd to be sincere, we have not grown too wise to trust them.

Meyer Lissner has made the discovery that Governor-elect Johnson's mind is not like virgin parchment, capable of any inscription.

We are told that from the fact that Mr. Roosevelt is able to keep on good terms with both Pinchot and Ballinger it is evident that he has tact. Has he ever been deserving of credit for anything else? Tact keeps its eye on the weathercock. Tact loses no time, takes all hints. Tact is the open eye, the quick ear, the keen smell and the lively touch.

Francis Thompson's Prose

By Theodore Bonnet

Of Francis Thompson, the poet, we have heard much since the posthumous publication of his essay on Shelley which sent the Dublin Review into a second edition, but of Francis Thompson, the artist in prose, nothing much is known beyond the small circle of his acquaintances in London. Yet, singularly enough, it was the poet's prose that attracted to the dead writer the attention of the great mass of readers that are not of the literary world. And in all probability it is his prose rather than his poetry that will serve to keep alive his fame; for his poetry though of the highest order of merit is not of the kind that appeals to the general; and perhaps stronger in its appeal than all the exquisite products of his genius is the melancholy of his career which, like the sorrows of Keats and of Chatterton, will forever cause him to be remembered with compassion. There were incidents in his career as touching as the most poignant of the vicissitudes experienced by De Quincey. Physically weak from his birth, disowned by his father, a physician, because he would not study medicine, he wandered to London where he was reduced to beggary, and sold pencils in the street. About this time occurred an incident similar to one of the most memorable in the life of the opium eater. The incident inspired one of the most beautiful of his minor poems:

Forlorn, and faint, and stark,
I had endured through watches of the dark,
The abashless inquisition of each star,
Yea, was the outcast mark
Of all those heavenly passers' scrutiny;
Stood bound and helplessly
For Time to shoot his barbed minutes at me;
Suffered the trampling hoof of every hour
In night's slow-wheeled car;
Until the tardy dawn dragged me at length
From under those dread wheels; and, bled of strength,
I waited the inevitable last
Then there came past
A child; like thee, a spring flower; but a flower
Fallen from the budded coronal of Spring,
And through the city streets blown withering
She passed,—O brave, sad, lovingest, tender thing!—
And of her own sad pittance did she give,
That I might eat and live;
Then fled, a swift and trackless fugitive.

It is of the prose rather than of the poetry of Thompson that I would speak. Of the making of good poetry there is no end, but of the making of good English prose there is so little that it must give us pause whenever a new master of the subtle art comes to our notice. Now, by

"KOH-I-NOOR" Pencils write smoothly, evenly and the points never break. They may be had in 17 degrees—for writing, drawing, copying.—H. S. Crocker Co., 460 Market St., S. F.

Thompson as by De Quincey prose was regarded as "a secondary stream of the Pierian fount" and as a prose painter he is entitled to rank pretty close to Ruskin; as a maker of prose melodies, to Sir Thomas Brown. A little volume of Thompson's prose essays has fallen into my hands, and I find them to be as exquisite as anything that ever came from the sweetened pen of Robert Louis Stevenson. From Thompson we receive additional proof of the fact that our language possesses more than ordinary powers of picturesque expression. The author of these essays, it is plain, was a man who took pains to write English with accuracy, to display its beauties and to make its powers serve their purpose gracefully. The result is a diction that is both sparkling and energetic. Take for example this passage:

"Come, therefore, O Sadness, fair and froward and tender; wasp who followest the fliers; dolorous coquette of the Abyss, who claspest them that shun thee, with fierce kisses that hiss against their tears; wraith of the mists of sighs; mermaid of the flood Cocytus, of the waves which are salt with the weeping of the generations; most menacing seductress, whose heart is strung with lamentations, whose voice is fatal with disastrous prescience; draw me down, merge me, under the waters of wail! Of thy undesired loveliness am I desirous; for I have looked long on thy countenance, and can forget it not, nor the footfalls of thy majesty which still shake the precincts of my heart; under the fringed awnings of the sunsets thou art throned, and thy free parts the enfolding pavilions of the Evens; thou art very dear to the heart of Night; thou art mistress of the things unmetable which are dreadful to meted life, mistress of the barren heath and barren soul of man, mistress of the weepings of death and of birth; the cry of the bride is thine and the pangs of the first kiss, the pain which is mortise to delight, the flowers which trail between the ruined chaps of mortality, the overfoliaging death which chequers all human suns."

This is indeed poetic prose, the kind that moves your emotions while enlightening your intellect and stirring your thought.

What is called style in prose is not merely the dress of our thoughts. It has a distinct and absolute value, bearing, as a great master of prose has said, the same relation to thought as the body does to the spirit, and it was so regarded by Thompson. While thought is the substantial object of an essay the manner of presenting it is not of trivial concern. Thompson has a manner that at once touches the imagination and makes the idea clearer, as for example in this passage descriptive of Carlyle's sentences:

"They roll like boulders down a mountain slope, with rough, thunderous jar and concussion, yet striking out a harmony in their rugged contact beyond the reach of shaped and quarried law. Fiery and fuliginous (to use his own favored word), with rent and steaming storm-rack of turmoiled imagery, their splendor zig-zags against a ground of murky and jostling utterance, from which they emerge and into which they fall back."

Thompson as a prose artist is not merely distinguished, as in the foregoing passages by rhetorical exuberance. His style is notable chiefly for its tenderness, for its avoidance of every harsh or violent word, and for the pre-eminence of those two first qualities of prose—rhythm and ease. There is nothing so difficult as the apparent ease of a clear and flowing style, and this is what Thompson has achieved, as may be seen in innumerable passages similar to this one which I take at random from his essay on Don Quixote:

"But this strange irony, this grave irony, this broadly-laughing irony, of the strange, grave humorous Spaniard, delights even those who have not a touch of the ironic in their composition. They laugh at the comic mask, who cannot see the melancholy face behind it. It is the Knight of the Rueful Countenance in the vizard of Sancho Panza; and all laugh, while some few have tears in their laughter. 'Ha! ha!' guffaw the many; 'well, to be sure, what an ass is this Don Quixote, and how vastly diverting are his absurd doings! Ha! ha!' And they know not that they are trapped and cozened into jeers; that Cervantes behind his mask, beholds their fat-witted grins with a sardonic smile."

In this essay as in others Thompson rambles on delightfully, developing new and curious theses that give evidence of keen and original insight, and with such ease that one almost fails to observe his rare genius as a manipulator of words in the expression of complex thought, as a master mechanic in the management of language. But perhaps his essays have no stronger attraction than that which lies in the glimpses they reveal of his own charming personality, the sweetness of his religious humility, his kindness, his sympathy, his transparent sincerity.

Opera in English

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: I was much amused this morning by an editorial in the Examiner recommending that operatic performances be given in English, and suggesting that San Francisco should work to bring the New York, Chicago and Boston managers to a realization of the rich field for English grand opera here on the Pacific Coast. Evidently the editor of the Examiner knows nothing of the efforts of Mr. Savagner to popularize opera by means of opera sung in English. Mr. Savage has appealed to the public, but there are not many. Most of the Italian and French operas when taken out of the setting of the romantic language in which they were written are far from satisfactory, the reason being that the high-flown sentiments impress one as very ridiculous when uttered in plain, every-day English. If you don't believe it try an evening of "La Boheme" as done by the Savage company.

Yours, etc.,

—Charles Stuart.

The Bradbury Habit

Editor Town Talk, Dear Sir: Some years ago the papers and many physicians were agitating the urgent need of the abatement of the bad habit. To this vulgar habit was rightly attributed the spread of much disease. As a result of the agitation an ordinance was passed making it a misdemeanor for a person to spit in public places. Now what I want to know is, What has become of that ordinance? Is it still in existence, and if so why isn't it enforced? I believe that an elderly millionaire was arrested for violating it when it was young, and that from his infraction of the law he derived a nickname that will stay with him longer than his memory of the punishment that a police judge inflicted. This old man was served up to us as an example, but in vain. The filthy and dangerous habit is still being indulged in our midst quite freely. Apparently nobody appears to feel it his duty to enforce the law; least of all the policeman who is perhaps the most conspicuous offender. I have a suggestion to make and it is this: that a society similar to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals be organized, and that each of its members be authorized to arrest any person caught in the act of menacing the lives of human beings. The members of the S. P. C. A. have almost stamped out the practice of abusing animals. I think that by similar organized effort it is possible at once to improve the manners of the vulgar and reduce the mortality rate. As a physician I should join such a society and I know several members of the profession who would do the same. It occurs to me that physicians should show some zeal in just such a matter as this.

Tolstoi's Home Life

Editor Town Talk,

Dear Sir: In their reviews of the life and the achievements of Count Tolstoi the newspapers have had surprisingly little to say about home life at Yasnaya Poliana. As Tolstoi's relations with his wife and children entered intimately into the tragedy of his end, it should have been worth while to give a few details. The countess is a woman of fine breeding and education, the daughter of a Moscow physician. Her family and the Tolstois had long been intimate when the count fell in love with her. His wooing was ardent and persistent and their marriage took place in 1861. They were very happy. He wrote to a friend after the marriage that he "felt like a new man" and in his "Confessions" he said: "The new condition of a happy family circle led me away from my researches into the meaning of life. My whole mind became concentrated on the family—on the mother, the children, the anxiety to provide due means of subsistence. The effort after perfection resolved itself into the effort to insure the happiness of my offspring." These are the words, are they not? of a man who among other qualities had a genius for domesticity. The Tolstois were blessed with sixteen children who were reared in conformity with the requirements of their social position. English and French governesses were engaged. The family bond was strong, the discipline firm, but punishment rare. It consisted in a strict boycott which was not relaxed until the offender had made a complete and frank confession of fault. Tolstoi entered with interest into the games and pastimes of his children, took them on his hunting and fishing trips and engaged in their outdoor exercises. He counted much on his wife's assistance in his literary work. She copied his manuscripts and discussed with him the plots of his stories. He once said: "She is an earnest helpmate to me." Are not these facts worth recording?

Slumming

By Lucie Delarue-Mardrus (From the French)

Was it the Quarter des Halles or rue Galande? The three women did not trouble themselves to find out. The four or five men who were with them probably knew, and besides, were they not accompanied by the detective, who, as a member of the secret police was privileged to conduct his group wherever they wished? Why tax one's mind by remembering the names of streets?

They had not enough eyes on this expedition to see all the horrors of the slums. The duchess, in particular, who had the habit of analyzing everything, had some difficulty in classifying her massive and violent sensations. Besides, she carried her lorgnette, which she had forgotten bringing; not that she was nearsighted, but she always viewed real life through an opera-glass.

Amused her to walk the streets in a skirt she borrowed from the chambermaid, wearing what she had bought for a few cents for this special occasion. This trip in disguise was an adventure; she knew she was pretty, no matter what costume she wore. Even in her plain dress she could not but notice her delicate complexion, blond hair and her dark blue eyes, which a touch of kohl made larger. In this strange environment it seemed to her that she was a different person; she almost trembled at the sound of her own voice and yet in some way it pleased her to talk—so much so that her escort had said several times: "Do not let us talk. We do not wish to attract too much attention."

The waiter nodded approvingly and the little baroness, who was beginning to be frightened, clung to her husband's arm and devoutly wished she were at home. As for the friend of the duchess, she pretended to be utterly indifferent, but as a matter of fact they were all afraid. That was the sensation they were seeking and for the enjoyment of which they might pay dearly.

When they arrived at the first den, the detective assumed an air of importance. Their hearts beat violently. For these people whose minds were practically worn out from social activities, there began a sort of nightmare.

A door opened and they perceived a little cashier seated by a smoking lamp. They mounted a circular stairway and after they had taken the first few steps they were almost overpowered by the horrible odor. Upon entering, the detective had whispered to them that the people who frequented this place were employees of the market and that they slept during the day and worked during the night. Between jobs they came in to get a drink, but there was always an agent of the secret police on hand.

The duchess made a mental note: "The markets where people work all night to be ready for the business of the morning. All who come here are at least thieves. It is a dangerous place."

When they opened the door of the large room, badly lighted by a few lamps, they first noticed a number of wooden tables and stools. A few boys with apparently painted faces, seemed to be waiting for someone, and in the corner a man was pounding upon a wretched piano. One woman sang a song, then another. The duchess thought to herself: "This is doubtless the music of the assassins, and these women are fearfully ugly; but the men are not so bad; there are some faces among these criminals that are not at all displeasing."

One of the men, a little fellow, dressed in black, with red hair and strange eyes, who might have been a poet in distress, had looked keenly at the duchess. She noted his look and said to herself: "He sees through this disguise." But they had scarce time to draw breath before one of the women exclaimed: "Say, boys, this is a slumming party. They are probably grand dukes. Let's fire 'em!"

From those who sat about the table there came

The Two New Battleships

The two new battleships, bids for which will be opened at the Navy Department on December 1 next, will be the most powerful war vessels afloat. Each will carry a main battery of ten 14 inch guns. In addition these vessels will be equipped with thicker armor than the battleships of the preceding type, the Arkansas and Wyoming. The proposed vessels will carry 12,764 tons of armor, which is 400 tons more than that of the Arkansas type. This increased weight of armor will be distributed in the armor belt and in turret and armored bulkheads. The main water line armor belt will be increased from eleven to twelve inches in thickness. There will be a corresponding increase in the thickness of the turret armor. The bids for furnishing armor for the new vessels will also be opened on December 1.

Pity the Poor Professor

The life of a university professor is anything but a bed of roses, yet there are people in the world who do not scruple to add to its hardships. Among these may be included the busy women who represent the wonderful W. C. T. U. in Berkeley. These women raised up their voices and roared in horrendous unison when the students started to lay plans for their annual "beer-bust." That was bad enough, for the most wicked thing about a university "beer bust" is its name. But the women were not through roaring. From the Berkeley Gazette I learn that they have addressed a letter to President Wheeler, protesting against the use of wine at the dinners of the Faculty Club. Now it seems to me that if university professors are not to be permitted to sip a genial glass once in a while without arousing the indignation of the W. C. T. U., we might just as well turn the State university over to the tender ministrations of the ladies themselves. A college professor by his position circumscribes himself in many liberties belonging to other men and it is cruelty of the most refined sort to forbid his occasional indulgence in a mild libation. Most men would be driven to inebriety if compelled to preside for a week over a lecture room full of college boys and co-eds. Let us be tender of the professors.

Our Population

Los Angeles, on the face of the census returns, has increased about two hundred per cent during the past ten years, while San Francisco has only increased twenty-one per cent. Naturally our southern sister will be crowing about the rapid strides she has been making. It does not become us to rebuke this youthful effusiveness, but it is pleasant to know that others are taking up the cudgels in our behalf. The Sacramento Union is to the fore in defense of San Francisco, as follows:

"San Francisco has done no annexing. It covers the same area today it did ten years ago, while Los Angeles has not only annexed all the territory that it could legitimately claim, but also some twenty-six miles of farm land with its population, and a town or two which lie as far from the Los Angeles courthouse and are no more connected with Los Angeles really than Dixon or Woodland are legitimate parts of Sacramento. In fact, the Yolo courthouse is nearer the State capitol, even estimating the distance by the railroad line via Davis, than San Pedro is to the Los Angeles courthouse or postoffice. The great increase in Oakland and Alameda and Berkeley represents the overflow from San Francisco, and so does the increased population of southern Marin and northern San Mateo, all of which sections are far nearer the San Francisco postoffice than are San Pedro and its neighbors to Los Angeles. If, following the Los Angeles plan, San Francisco had annexed all the territory that is occupied by people who do everything but sleep in the Bay City, its population would be easily 675,000, an increase in percentage nearly as great as that of Los Angeles."

The Entente Cordiale in Fresno

To say that Editor Gilmour of the Fresno Herald and Editor Rowell of the Fresno Republican are on terms of the most intimate friendship would be putting the wrong face on their relations. The fact is that there is war between them. I doubt whether they speak as they pass by. When a salutation passes between them, it is of this character (I quote from the Fresno Herald):

"Mayor Rowell's paper has to be congratulated upon the tremendous influence it wields in the City of Fresno, an influence so far-reaching that it is almost appalling. It actually, according to its own statement, carried this town for Hiram W. Johnson by two votes! And though there is some doubt about that it cannot be denied that as 'a hoodoo' Mayor Rowell's paper is without a parallel in the State, at least that is what Mr. Mason says who ran for sheriff, also Drew and others who had the support of that powerful organ."

Editors Still Clashing

I thought that the close of the campaign would bring surcease of newspaper vituperation, but the editors are just as bitter in their post-mortems as in the heat of the fighting. Editor McClatchy of the Sacramento Bee is having the time of his life telling what he thinks about Editor Older of the Bulletin. Here is one of the paragraphs which comes hurtling down from the City of the Sacrament:

"When a paper with such a decayed and ill-smelling past as the Bulletin's—drunk with a victory she conceives to be all her own—starts out to run amuck against every journal not edited to suit her crazy whims—against every man who declines to be lashed into a cringing position by Meyer Lissner and Fremont Older—then it is high time this journalistic lady with a past be requested not to parade her self-advertised virtue so offensively in the camp until she has spent a little longer period of repentance in the Magdalen asylum."

A Blarneyer from Santa Cruz

The readers of the Santa Cruz Sentinel have been regaled of late by a number of letters from abroad written by Monsignor P. J. Fisher, one of their townsmen. The last letter came from Dublin and displayed this priest in the role of an adept at the kind of language usually associated with the magic stone of Blarney. Can you Listen to His Reverence:

"One of the party, a lady from San Francisco who is well known in Santa Cruz, did a graceful act. She sat directly opposite me in the hotel dining room and after grace she took the liberty (God bless them. Sure, every American girl loves liberty, and usually a genial one of liberty as well) of saying, 'Father, you do grace, now I am going to do the graceful thing. And she took the flag and presented it to my lips. It was indeed a sweet, thoughtful and patriotic thing to do, and it brought down the table. A bright-eyed Irish lad who sat not far from me sighed and then said, 'How sorry I am I was not that flag.' Seeing that his heart was really a party to the concern, I said to him interestingly, 'Have courage and don't let your spirit go down. Some day that living American beauty may press the tulips (two lips) of a living flag pinned together by the Irish white thread. Then two hearts will beat together forever on a day.'"

Our Own Joaquin, "Vagabond and Angel"

Over in Salt Lake Editor Goodwin of Goodwin's Weekly has been saying things about Joaquin Miller, apropos of Joaquin's sixty-ninth birthday. Here is the way Editor Goodwin praises:

"In no other soul has the vagabond and the angel been so united.

"He would be perfectly at home in an Inferno, but were Apollo and all the muses to visit him in his home, he would have the muses all hypnotized and Apollo dead drunk before morning, and then were Bacchus himself to come along fresh and rosy, before night 'Joaquin' would have him put to bed insensible, and would be out on the veranda looking for another goddess. Then this being Milton anniversary week, we were his high soul to be incarnated and carried to Miller's home and introduce himself, Miller would gravely salute him and say: 'John, you wrote some stately things when your home was here on the coast, but sit down and we will put in the night together and measure up in the morning to see which of us wear the laurel crown tomorrow, for while I call heaven and all the angels to help you, I call upon my mountains here and the sea rolls outside and the spirits that hover about both, and together we will make this night glorious by our work. You will write with what I dream, I will write with what I know, for I have my unseen messengers as well as you.'"

If Joaquin ran for office that would damn him with the local option vote.

The Drifter

By John P. Wilson

The fool thinks that 'tis liberty
To float upon the lazy sea
Of "I Don't Care"; that never he Shall share responsibility.
But to the sea of "I Don't Care"
He is a slave, his powers rust;
To break his bonds, his soul must dare
The rugged steeps of "Care You Must!"

I drifted with the ebb and flow,
A bit of flotsam, to and fro
Along the lanes where sad wrecks go;
I felt the treacherous undertow.
Then midst the sea of "I Don't Care"
I saw the isle of "Care You Must,"
As if in answer to my prayer
For something stable I could trust.

Sick of the days of aimless drift,
Sick of the days of shameful shift,
Sick of the sloth, the weak unthrift—
Oh will some pow'r my soul uplift?
Then from the sea of "I Don't Care," Uprose the isle of "Care You Must,"
As if in answer to my prayer
For something stable I could trust.

It taxed my strength to reach the land,
The breakers leaped, the rocky strand
Showed scarce a hold on which to stand;
I clambered up by foot and hand.
"No more," I cried, "of I Don't Care!
I've gained the isle of Care You Must!
Henceforth its toil I gladly share;
Toil will bring peace, for toil is just!"

The Spectator

Why Older Did Not Speak

Why did not Fremont Older, the managing editor of the Bulletin, speak at the Heney banquet? The question has been asked by many of those who were present and the answer involves an interesting story. Incidentally it explains why Congressman-elect Kent's speech was not reported in full, like the other speeches, in the Bulletin of the day following, but consigned in extremely condensed form, to an obscure corner of the paper. The committee which arranged the Heney banquet consisted of Matt Sullivan, ex-mayor Taylor and Tom Williams, the grand juror. This committee was startled and perplexed one day when word came from Fremont Older that he desired R. A. Crothers chosen as toastmaster and himself as one of the speakers. The committee did not want to offend the Bulletin's proprietor or the Bulletin's managing editor, but at the same time thought that it would be inadvisable to have them figuring so prominently in the love-feast. So they pondered the matter and sent word to Older that they were going to ask Charles S. Wheeler to act as toastmaster, but that they would find room for Older, if possible, in the list of speakers. When Older received this message he flew off the handle and threatened all sorts of reprisals and the committee then got so frightened that they agreed to substitute Crothers for Wheeler. But at this time of the negotiations Congressman-elect Kent got a hand. Somebody told him that Crothers and Older were going to shine resplendently at the feast and he immediately let out a roar that could be heard from Kentfield to the Bulletin office. Kent doesn't like Older a little bit and he is so, adding that if Older were allowed to speak he would kick the banquet into a cocked snuff. Knowing how close Kent is to Heney the committee could do nothing but lie down before defiance and Older was eliminated from the list of speakers. He looked a very unhappy man during the banquet; but he got a sort of revenge the day by all but ignoring Kent's speech.

Kent, Johnson and the Bulletin

Just what particular grievance Kent has against Older, it would be difficult to say; but the choicest California table wine which you can secure at all hotels, restaurants and cafes, is the Italian-Swiss Colony's celebrated TIPO, red or white.

his friends intimate that he has never been impressed with the Older methods of reform. However that may be, there can be no doubt that he has a decidedly inimical feeling toward Older and also toward the Bulletin. It is being narrated how Kent and Johnson happened to meet at Marysville during the progress of the campaign and how they put their heads together over the latest issue of the Bulletin which had just arrived in Marysville. The way Older was handling their campaigns did not please them a little bit and I am told that for some time the air was blue with profanity directed against the paper and its presiding genius. As Older is never slow to retaliate on those who do not whole-heartedly accept his methods, it would not surprise me to see the Bulletin open up its batteries on Kent at an early date.

The Governor-elect Was Surprised

Governor-elect Hiram Johnson has probably reached the conclusion by this time that the game of reform politics has more quirks and twists and surprises than appear on the surface. It is, of course, rather early for the newly chosen head of the Republican party in California to discover that his position does not entitle him to the privilege of knowing a little in advance of the public just what are the plans of his organization, but humiliating as that discovery must be, it is no doubt well to make it as soon as possible. Having been disillusioned as to the scope of his premiership Governor-elect Johnson can now take steps to accommodate his plans to the situation. The gubernatorial mind was disillusioned last Tuesday when the members of the State Central Committee, the leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League and various citizens in sympathy with the reform program met in the St. Francis tea room for what one of the political writers with a sense of humor characterized as "a love feast." From another account of this affair I learn that the governor-elect "took a modest seat in the background." In more ways than one that very aptly describes what the governor-elect was compelled to do. The developments in that room usually dedicated to the consumption of tea and cakes by chattering beauties were a great surprise to the governor. I doubt whether he has yet recovered from the shock he received when the political samovar began to hum.

Johnson Was Not Consulted

It was Meyer Lissner, chairman of the State Central Committee, who surprised Johnson. Lissner's little surprise for the governor-elect took the form of a coup and more than one of those present gasped when it was pulled off. Lissner applied to the executive committee for authority to appoint a number of committees to be "charged with the preparation of the necessary bills and constitutional amendments for the assistance of the legislature and to insure legislative redemption of the pledges made by the Republican State platform." Hiram Johnson may have wondered at this move, particularly when the executive committee accorded Lissner the permission he sought; but he must have been overcome with amazement when Lissner produced a long list neatly typewritten and made public the names of his committees. For Johnson knew absolutely nothing about all this. He had not been consulted; he had been given no hint of the plan; he was allowed to estimate its length and breadth like the veriest outsider. For the sake of appearances he refrained from expressing his feelings, but I have every reason to suppose that they were compact of humiliation, anger and resentment in about equal proportions.

as "a departure from all American political precedents" and "the most remarkable step in the history of the Republican party." It was all of that. It is a theory of politics that a governor-elect should be charged with the duty of recommending to the legislature the enactment of laws to fulfill the pledges contained in the party platform. The governor does this in his message to the legislature and thereafter supervises the drawing of the bills and selects the legislators whom he thinks best qualified to see them through to final passage. It was natural for Governor-elect Johnson to take it for granted that this traditional method would be followed and when Meyer Lissner calmly infringed his prerogative by charging himself with the initiation of legislation, Rowell did not overstate the case when he referred to what had been done as "a departure from all American political precedents." Does Meyer Lissner distrust Governor Johnson? Does he doubt his ability to carry out the pledges he made during his campaign? Does he place a low appraisal on the talents of the legislators to whom the new governor would have entrusted the administration bills? These are all pertinent questions in view of what has taken place.

The Shadow of Coming Trouble

That it is not taking too gloomy a view of the situation to predict that it will cause a heap of trouble for Governor Johnson, for the members of the Legislature and for Lissner's multitudinous committeemen was proved by the discussion which followed the naming of the committees. Mayor White of Sacramento proposed that the committees should continue in existence until they had seen their several bills through the legislature. But former State Senator Belshaw of Antioch "cautioned against any action that might have the appearance of an attempt to jam programmed legislation through a legislature that would resent infringement upon its prerogatives." Evidently Belshaw has a tenderness for the Legislature which Meyer Lissner does not feel for the governor. It is expected that the Lissner committees will meet the State executive committee and the members of the new Legislature in this city at the end of December and report what they have done, but whether the executive body will be allowed to pass its approval on their work remains to be decided. Lieutenant Governor-elect Wallace opposed such a step, fearing "that it might make for friction." From all of which it may be inferred that the clouds on the horizon are charged with the stuff of storms.

The Santa Barbara Caucus

Not less remarkable than the action of Meyer Lissner in taking charge of the work of the next Legislature was the senatorial caucus held at the close of last week in the Hotel Potter at Santa Barbara. It was dignified by the appellation of "a conference," but to my vision which may be myopic and uncertain it bore all the earmarks of a caucus. Whether any resentment was expressed during this caucus at the action of Meyer Lissner I am unable to state, for its deliberations were of a secret nature. Equally I am at a loss to say what those senators who were not invited to attend think about it all. Certainly it was an unprecedented meeting. In the palmiest days of the old Republican machine the senatorial adherents of the organization never dreamed of thus getting together in advance of the Legislature to map out their program. But new machines bring new methods and it may be that the State will be tremendously benefitted by the Santa Barbara caucus whose members, I learn from one of the despatches, "are sworn to secrecy concerning its purpose."

Choosing a Party Leader

I am very much interested in the attempts of the reform senators to arrive at some agreement as to their leader in the upper chamber. It seems that they are trying to "choose" a leader. I had an old-fashioned idea that party leaders were not "chosen" at caucuses but developed on the floor of the Legislature. But the reform legislators are not going to leave anything to the uncertain future. They desire to march upon the foes of the dear people with complete organization. So they are putting their heads together for the purpose of "choosing" a leader. Three leaders have so far been mentioned—Senator Stetson of Oakland, Senator Boynton of Oroville and Senator Lee Gates of Los Angeles. There are objections to all three. Stetson is aligned in the interesting politics of his home county with Guy Earl and George Pardee, both of whom are regarded with considerable suspicion by reformers from other bailiwicks. So Stetson may not be "chosen." Boynton has important corporation connections, being associated as attorney with the Northern Electric and other concerns which are doing wonders for northern California. So the reformers who throw fits when the hated name of any corporation is mentioned, may object to "choosing" him. Lee Gates is a newcomer in the Legislature and it is only human nature for the hold-over senators to object to being led by a tyro. So there you are. All three are strong men—there is no doubt of that. Gates is a good talker, Stetson is a hard worker and a man of ideas; and Boynton has experience, conservative tendencies and the respect of every man in the Legislature, reformer or performer. But the process of "choosing" a leader from these men or others is going to be a mighty ticklish one. For, all other considerations aside, reformers are apt to be jealous of one another.

Nirvana for Sultana

With much announcement and ado the work was advised last Tuesday that Dr. Henry Amli of New York, a veterinarian of some repute would operate before the San Francisco Veterinary College for the benefit of the students that institution. Sultana, a young lioness from the Chutes was to suffer the amputation of a toe. Dr. Amli was to demonstrate the skill of a veterinary surgeon. Wednesday the operating room was crowded with students, correspondents of papers and photographers, and with great deference, all present listened to the words of the operating surgeon. In the course of the lecture to the students Dr. Amli declared that it was difficult to give a beast too much ether. As he made the statement he poured more of the fluid over the cone surrounding Sultana's nose. "Don't be afraid," he said, "to give an animal plenty of anesthetic. It is doubtful if you will ever give them too much." Sultana never recovered from the anesthetic. The operation was highly successful.

"Well, who do you think you are?" asked David, unafraid.

"I am the man higher up," gruffly answered Goliath, looking contemptuously down upon him. But David got him.

The Invasion of Guatemala

Interesting topics of conversation had been exhausted in the bar room of the St. Francis Hotel a few nights ago, so to stimulate the lull in conversation a newspaperman suggested that a Guatemalan revolution be planned. Instantly enthusiasm flared forth. George W. Field, the Nevada millionaire, immediately subscribed half a million; Ray Baker offered his services as generalissimo of the army of invasion; Tom Horton, the mining man who once called down "Death Valley Scotty," placed his check book at the service of the revolutionists; General Homer Lea promised to map out the best line of attack; and Bob Cordes offered to supply the fleet from the boats of the local fish trust. It was taken for granted that San Francisco's generals would all offer their services; but as names were told over—Colonel Kowalsky, Colonel Trumbo, Colonel Marston, Colonel P. Colonel Brady, Colonel Mazuma, Colonel Burns and Colonel Dorn—it was observed that Tasker Oddie, Nevada's new governor, seemed Governor Oddie was immediately informed that there was no place on earth where a similar list of colonels could be made up, so he took heart again and promised that as soon as he took office he would begin appointing colonels to his staff until Nevada was in a position to make a showing. When that is done, the revolution will proceed. Guatemala had better look out.

He Defied Fickert

General Homer Lea who came up from Pasadena to attend the merchant marine congress, is a very interesting man. He is a hunchbacked dwarf of most diminutive size who does not hesitate to call attention to his deformity. On the occasion which I have just described District Attorney Fickert was present and was very much amazed when General Lea walked over to him and looking up at him, as David must have looked up at Goliath, exclaimed: "You big stiff, get up to the bar and drink your grog." Laughing heartily the husky six-foot-and-over district attorney obeyed. General Lea is best known for his book, "The Valor of Ignorance," which deals in the frankest manner with the inadequacy of our national defenses in the event of a Japanese invasion of the Philippines and the Pacific Coast. The book has an introduction by Lieutenant-General Chaffee and is much in demand among army officers, especially those stationed in Manila. General Lea received his military title from the Chinese government.

The Farewelling of Brown

Two weeks ago, speaking of the Rev. C. R. Brown's resignation from the pulpit of the First Congregational Church, I observed that notwithstanding the great prestige he had enjoyed, the ministers on both sides of the bay were somewhat slow in coming forward to attest their deep regret at Oakland's loss. Observing also that Dr. Brown appeared to have resigned under something in the nature of a cloud, I suggested that scepticism regarding his explanation of his sudden determination to seek pastures new might be allayed if the ministers of Oakland were to follow their usual custom of passing what they might regard as appropriate resolutions. Hardly was Town Talk off the press when my hints were taken. The result was that at a farewell luncheon given in the parlors of the First Congregational Church last Monday several ministers spoke in very complimentary terms of Dr. Brown. And doubtless Dr. Brown was highly pleased with the success of the affair, as there was reason for him to be notwithstanding the absence of some of his co-workers in the vineyard of the lord on the Oakland side of the bay. There is now not much more for Dr. Brown to do beyond getting a complimentary dismissal from the Congregational Council for which, I believe, he is striving. After he gets that I may take occasion to suggest just one thing more essential to the easing of his mind and the completion of his happiness on the eve of his departure. Dr. Brown says that he will shortly resume for a time his boyhood life on the old homestead in Iowa. Let us hope that when he goes he will be absolutely free from carking care and bubbling over with the joy of living.

Pretty Hard on Raymond

Among the guests invited to the St. Francis to hear the wonderful Kellogg lecture on birdlore, was Raymond Duncan. Duncan has been keeping so quiet since the critics lambasted him that one would infer that he was no longer in our midst. But sure enough Raymond showed up in his beloved chiton, chlamys and sandals. When House Detective Hirschey of the St. Francis beheld him he mistook him for some sort of a performer and shooed him off towards the stage door, so Raymond had considerable difficulty in getting settled. At the conclusion of the lecture he passed a group of society women which included Mrs. Herbert Moffitt, Mrs. Carroll Buck, Mrs. Henry T. Scott and others. One of them took a look at Raymond's bare arm and remarked quietly: "Six years ago I used Pear's soap and since then have used no other."

The Position of Sheriff Finn

Sheriff Tom Finn occupies a peculiar position as a result of the election of Hiram Johnson. Finn was one of the busiest Johnsonians in this city and did as much as any other local politician to give Hiram a plurality here. His influence was felt particularly in the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth districts which he represents in the State senate and which include a great deal of the waterfront, but he was active in other parts of town and succeeded in swinging a lot of union labor votes that usually follow the lead of Mayor McCarthy. In fact his activity was of such a nature as to convince many political observers that Finn is ambitious to take the union labor dictatorship away from the mayor. As to that we will learn more when the municipal campaign gets under way. But while Finn was working for Johnson he found time to take a hand in the election of San Francisco legislators and he is credited with the control of the delegation which will go from this city to Sacramento. That makes an interesting situation. Most of the legislators who were elected in this city are popularly supposed to have obtained the money for their heavy campaign expenses from Pete McDonough who does a thriving saloon and bail bond business across the street from the Hall of Justice and who is a political crony of Finn's. The question arises, Will Tom Finn and Pete McDonough swing the legislative votes which they control to Governor Johnson? And will the new governor welcome these strange recruits to the ranks of reform? During the campaign there was no doubt about Johnson's attitude. While Sheriff Finn was persona non grata at the headquarters presided over by Meyer Lissner, he was a constant visitor at Johnson's law office in the Mills Building where Al McCabe, Mark Noon, Bob Duke, Duffy (Johnson's law partner) and others directed the practical work of the local fight. Finn was always welcome in the inner office; which causes a great many politicians to wonder whether he will retain the entree when Johnson moves to Sacramento.

The cub reporter was telling an extra long tale at the press club.

"Well, boys," he continued, "to make a long story short—"

"Hand it to the desk editor!" interrupted the sporting writer, cruelly.

"The Stagnant City"

By this uncomplimentary title John J. Mathews, writing in the Boston Transcript of November 12, designates New Orleans, the city which considers itself the "logical point" for the world's fair at 1915. Mr. Mathews is not greatly impressed with the civic spirit of New Orleans. He thinks that it has been quite correctly dubbed "McCloskeyville," since several enterprising men of that name seem to control all its business, including the Dock Board which Mr. Mathews calls "probably the rottenest political system in the United States." He has some very interesting things to say of the city's "rank indifference to wide things, its narrow vision, its inability to consider anything outside of the pettiest personal business, which has recently led the Steel Trust to prepare to set up its own warehouse and job its own goods under the noses of the New Orleans jobbers." He speaks of "the petty and picayune spirit of New Orleans business" and gives a significant instance. The Standard Oil, it seems, wanted a permanent assignment of a dock in New Orleans behind which to erect a $2,000,000 plant. It could not get one. As a result it moved to Baton Rouge and built there. Baton Rouge is a seaport and can issue port bills of lading, though it is two hundred miles above New Orleans. The waterfront is now equipped with the Standard Oil's new dock, well fixed for machinery. Meanwhile, what of the New Orleans harbor? Mr. Mathews says: "This immense harbor, which claims to be the natural and logical port of the whole Mississippi system, has not in its entire length a single piece of machinery for unloading grain from a barge. * * * If a million bushels were brought down, there is no way except by a grab bucket or by tin pails that it could be carried out of the barge."

Dead to its Opportunities

Mr. Mathews says that if New Orleans becomes a great Panama Canal port, it will be in spite of itself. He finds it dead to its opportunities, gripped by inertia, monopoly and machine politics, actually afraid of progress. He tells how New Orleans looks to the traveler as he enters: "You ride through miles of swamp and ex-swamp, street signs standing in the wilderness, truck farms and more swamps, sugar cane and a swampy bayou, past straggling farms and cottages, along miles of muddy unpicturesque Lake Pontchartrain, and arrive at a none too glorious depot, as like as not in the very edge of the most disreputable district the American Purity Society has ever been able to revel in." This sort of information should be interesting to Congress in connection with its world's fair deliberations. Of the exposition Mr. Mathews makes only the following mention at the conclusion of his article: "So much for the stagnant city. Memphis will soon pass it in population. Nevertheless it is going ahead strenuously on its campaign for the Panama Fair, and if no one raises the vexed question of whose land shall benefit, and if they can overcome the handicap San Francisco puts on them by being kinfolks to all the voters back East, the city will get it. It is the logical point as well as the logical port, and the immense publicity campaign ought to win out." A most impotent conclusion!

"Is your suburb wholesome?"

"No, old chap, it ain't. My wife lost her voice as soon as we moved out here, and—"

"What's the price of the lot next to yours?"

Employers Under Suspicion

A strange story comes to me from Los Angeles to the effect that the belief is current among the business men of that city that employers in the metal trades in San Francisco are making a weekly contribution to the strikers. The matter has been pretty thoroughly investigated, and nothing in the way of evidence has been found to justify so curious a suspicion; yet it is stubbornly adhered to, the theory in Los Angeles being that employers in San Francisco are eager to make conditions equal in both cities. The commercial interests in Los Angeles have been informed that sentiment in this city is hostile to the strikers, and that it is hoped the strike will prove a failure so that conditions may be equalized on the Los Angeles basis, but this information is regarded as a tax on credulity. The impression prevails in Los Angeles that the commercial interests of this city are too cowardly to resent labor union oppression, and that we shall continue to suffer until organized labor succumbs to inanition. At present we are being laughed at in Los Angeles for adopting the charter amendment fixing three dollars a day as the minimum wage for work done under public contract. This, it is asserted, is another spike in San Francisco's coffin.

Mayor McCarthy's Stand

While Los Angeles is pointing at us the finger of scorn it may be worth while to seek for consolation in the attitude taken by our union labor mayor as arbitrator of the dispute between employers in the furniture trade and the Upholsterer's union. His decision is one that all citizens should applaud. It is a decision against the principle of limitation of output. He demands that hereafter there shall be no restriction of output in any industry. Mayor McCarthy has earned the approbation of everybody engaged in an industrial pursuit.

Captain Jack O'Neill in South Africa

Who does not remember Captain Jack O'Neill of the Fourth Cavalry, one of the best beloved army officers ever quartered at the Presidio? And who can help recalling with sorrow the misfortune which put an end to what would have been a brilliant military career? I learned the other day that Captain Jack O'Neill is living in South Africa and rapidly amassing a great fortune. I heard too that he is a very dear friend of Baden-Powell, the hero of Mafeking and the originator of the "boy scout movement." I can imagine Captain Jack taking an eager interest in the boy scout movement, for when he left this city he had a son who was one of the manliest fellows imaginable. Nobody could ever decide who Captain Jack loved the more, his wife or his boy, so devoted was he to both of them. The news that this popular officer has started life anew at the other end of the world will be received with pleasure by his old friends here.

His Unhappy Story

Captain Jack O'Neill came to the Presidio with the Fourth Cavalry at the time of the Spanish war. He was eager to go to the front and was bitterly disappointed when he was detailed to the provisional camp. Having missed his opportunity to see actual service Captain Jack became careless, was seen a great deal in the company of boon companions who drank more than was good for them, and finally disappeared. Then it was discovered that the regimental funds of which he was the custodian, were short some $4000. Somehow or other John W. Mackay found where Captain Jack was hiding and forwarded the money to make good his shortage; so Captain Jack appeared one day at headquarters, paid what was missing and was punished for being absent without leave. it was discovered that a soldier of the regiment had entrusted O'Neill with $112 which was still missing; so he was court-martialed and sent to prison for four years. When he came out of prison Mackay moved heaven and earth to induce President McKinley to restore him to his rank, but the president was obdurate. So O'Neill went to Montana with friends and passed from sight. Then he received an opportunity to get

Colonel Chadbourn Very Ill

The friends of Colonel F. S. Charbourn, Boemian and Olympic clubman, wit, raconteur and friend indeed to his friends in need, are greatly worried over his condition. He had a stroke of paralysis not long ago and it is feared that he cannot live very long. Colonel Gasson of San Diego arranged to send him to a place in Placer County where he will have the best of care and other friends have come to his assistance. This is as it should be, for Colonel Chadbourn never heard a tale of distress without doing something to relieve the sufferer. He will be remembered, by the way, as one of the harbor commissioners who built the Ferry building. For years he was on the governor's staff. The fire worked havoc with his income.

The Tall Sycamore of Shasta

A very picturesque figure is "Tom" Shanahan of Shasta who returns next year to the Legislature after having been out of office for several years. Owing to his appearance somebody dubbed Shanahan the "tall sycamore of Shasta" and the nickname has stuck to him. He is an orator of the vehement kind, but somewhat handicapped, particularly in the excitement of his perorations, by a lisp. Shanahan's principal claim to immortality will rest on the fact that he invented the good old alliterative phrase, "from Siskiyou to San Diego, from the Sierras to the sea." Many a time did Shanahan use this embracing phrase in his speeches, but as there is no copyrighting such things, it has been appropriated by many orators and has become part of the common stock of spellbinding tags. It will be interesting to see whether the "tall sycamore" retains his old time virility.

"When I was in Europe this summer, said Gayman, trying to entertain the minister, "I got quite interested in some of them old churches."

"Indeed?" replied Rev. Mr. Gassaway. "I suppose you know St. Paul's in London?"

"No. You don't tell me? What hotel is he stopping at?"

A New Avocation

I have just discovered a new method by which a man and woman may earn their bread and butter in our bustling community. In the argot of the curb the occupation would be designated as that of "come-on" for a "chump chariot." Let me explain. It takes a good deal of time for the spielers to fill with prospective sightseers the big motor truck that has its stand in Market street between Third and Fourth and many of those who would like to take the ride around San Francisco hesitate to climb up into the sight-seeing automobile and wait there until the seats are filled. It is far from pleasant to sit in the "chump chariot," as the auto is called, and have all the passers-by stare at you. To obviate this difficulty the ingenious promoters of the enterprise have employed the "come-ons." These are a man and woman who climb up into the bus as soon as it discharges a load and sit there in perfect contentment and with ready disposition to enter into conversation with any other sight-seers who join them. In this way a busful of strangers is very rapidly assembled. At the last minute before the auto starts on its tour of the city a man rushes over to the curb and hails the "come-ons." He is a friend who has not seen them for a long time and he produces a telegram which is evidently of the greatest importance. In fact, it is so important that the "come-ons" hastily alight from the bus and continue an earnest conversation with the stranger. Then the auto honks away and the "come-ons" disappear until it returns when they resume their amiable occupation.

They Saw Her Hobble Garters

If several young society swells should compliment a beautiful and stunning debutante by saying, "I think your hobble hand embroidered garters are really the handsomest I have seen," society would be shocked, but just the same these society chaps would be speaking by the card. This is how it happened. A certain stately and interesting debutante celebrated her nineteenth birthday recently at a jolly but informal luncheon. As she is extremely popular the presents were numerous, ranging from flowers and candy to more substantial tokens. During luncheon the door bell rang furiously and a messenger handed the maid a dainty package wrapped in tissue paper tied with pink ribbons. The debutante untied the package for the purpose of exhibiting the gift, but after taking a peep at the contents she changed her mind and no persuasion could induce her to proceed. Naturally she was joked by all the beaux and belles present, but she stoutly refused to appease their curiosity. At length her irrepressible young brother aged nine years snatched the mysterious package and for the edification of the young men present, displayed a beautiful set of hand embroidered hobble garters, while the young girls ran screaming from the table.

Men Scarce at the Greenway

The chill of the last Greenway is not yet dissipated. Debutantes in furs will shiver when they think of it. There were six girls to every man, not strung along like wall flowers on a trellis but gathered in forlorn little groups that sought companionship of one another in the fearful isolation that threatened. Not until too late were the conditions realized. There were a dozen dinners before the dance and when invitations to them were declined by one man after the other because he was not included among the Greenway guests, the hostesses began to compare notes. Most of them had had the same experience and it began to look as though a very limited number of men had been invited to the Czar's birthday celebration. On the day of the dance an anxious mother of a debutante telephoned Greenway and told him she wanted cards for several men who would be her dinner-guests. Then she telephoned other mothers and they did the same thing. But it was too late to avert the frost. A few bachelors were gathered in and did the best they could but were too greatly out-numbered. The married crowd enjoyed itself staidly but the younger set suffered. With all his experience and aplomb Greenway should not have allowed this to happen. Is it possible that he is growing careless with years? There were an even number of married people but a score of debutantes for whom twice as many dancing men should have been provided for. That is to say, it looked that way; but when a Greenway fails of complete success, it is perhaps wise to look to the invited guests, not to the Czar, for the cause.

Society on Parade

For me the beautiful kaleidoscopic tableaux of the Imperial Russian Ballet at the Valencia Theater last Monday night were marred by some of the unbeautiful personages of our provincial aristocracy. The boxes were crowded with them, and several of them insisted either on getting into the picture during the performance or immediately succeeding the stage picture as soon as the curtain dropped. Judging from the manners of some of the people in the boxes they went to the theater not so much for the purpose of seeing the performance as for the purpose of forming part of the spectacle. Their attitudinizing was almost as demonstrative as that of the radiant and pretty dancers on the stage. And the sad part of it was that most of them have ceased to be interesting. They came out long before Mr. Greenway needed a stimulant for his enthusiasm, and they have ceased to harmonize with their millinery. The kittenishness of them in this day and generation is an anachronism.

MISS ELSIE DE WOLFE
MISS FRANCES KIMBY

The Colonial Dames of America will hold their annual breakfast at the Fairmont the first week in December.

They Were Jealous of the Teacher

The "Boston" or "Harvard" dance, which is all the rage in the East, has been slow in reaching this city. In fact I heard a young girl remark that for some reason nearly all our young ladies here are timid about taking the initiative in introducing it. It is a slow dreamy dance, calculated to make the hobble skirt look more or less attractive; but it is not pronounced a graceful dance by our critical belles. It remained for Miss Margaret Roosevelt, who came here for Christine Pomeroy's wedding, to bring it out at the Century Club last Friday night. She took delight in teaching many of the young men the intricacies of the "short step" but was soon surrounded by so many pupils that several other girls who did not relish her unsought monopoly of the men, banded together to break up the impromptu class in the corner where the fair visitor spent the greater part of the evening. Thus do petty jealousies hinder the great work of education.

Cinderellas More Exclusive This Year

The announcement that the Cinderellas will repeat the brilliant success of their ball last year has been received with delight. It is said somewhat more rigorous censorship of the invitation list will prevail this year. Before the ball given last January it was intended to keep the affair more exclusive than the Colonial or the Patronesses' dances at the St. Francis. The names submitted by subscribers were carefully gone over. But by the week of the ball the list had got beyond the committee. Requests for invitations for friends and the friends of friends came so thick and fast that a far greater crowd was in attendance than had been counted on. There were several guests in particular whose presence was much commented on. I am assured that no question of fitness to attend the Menlo set soiree will attach to any guest present this year.

The Inactive Blingumites

As for the Burlingame set it has been conspicuous by its inactivity this season. Mr. Henry T. Scott and the mesdames Taylor and were leading spirits in promoting the late Patronesses' balls have said nothing of plans for others to come. These affairs which were given no designative name were the most elaborate subscription dances society has known. The comparative simplicity of the Greenways has been them was marked. It is a pity if they are not to be repeated. However with the Tevis, Stuart Thomas, and Doe balls in prospect, with the Greenways, Gayeties and Cinderellas there will probably be enough dancing until Lent.

The Reorganized Gayety

The reorganized Gayety Club is the most interesting feature of the season's program so far. The Irwin-Crocker wedding will doubtless dwarf everything when its turn comes, but that is still several months down the list. The Gayety dancers are at once the jolliest and most exclusive part of the year and membership in the club is a girl's position and popularity. One member is hostess on each occasion and if there is no room in her home the dance may take place in the Century Hall. One of the members admitted this year is Miss Agnes Tillman who will doubtless preside at a meeting, as the Tillmans have one of the largest private ball-rooms in town. Miss Gertrude Thomas is another new member who ome is well adapted for a dancing party and the Boardman residence which is the home of Miss Dora Winn, another honored debutante invited to join the Gayety, could also comfortably accommodate a small ball. Miss Florence Hopkins who is the Gayety's new president will be hostess at one dance, probably the first, to be given in December. No extra girls receive invitations to these affairs and there are always a double number of men present.

The Bohemian Club members have decided to give their lady friends an opportunity of viewing their new club and will in the very near future issue invitations for one of those ladies' days that are always enjoyed by the fair sex.

Kathleen Thompson's Distinction

Mrs. Kathleen Thompson Norris who gave up newspaper work in this city to go to New York as the bride of Frank Norris' brother, has been distinguishing herself in the metropolis. During the past month she had five stories in the magazines and became the mother of what I am confidently assured is the cutest baby in New York. It is not often that so much distinction is showered upon a woman at one time. But Kathleen Thompson was always an exceptional woman. At one time she had charge of a "Children's Day Home" conducted by nuns in this city and when she left to go into newspaper work, the good sisters used to pay regular visits to the newspaper office entreating her to return. Even the mothers of the youngsters used to call and tell her how much the children missed her. Just before marrying and leaving this city she interviewed Margaret Illington who was in the throes of her divorce sensation, for the Examiner. Hearst was in the city at the time and paid her a high compliment for that piece of work. Among other things Mrs. Norris has been winning fiction prizes from the Black Cat.

The Spreckels Cruise

Mrs. John D. Spreckels came to this city from San Diego a few days ago and has been a great deal in the company of her daughter, Mrs. Hamilton. She is busily engaged arranging for the extensive yachting cruise which the Spreckels family will take during the winter months. The party, including Mr. and Mrs. Spreckels and a small group of local friends will start early in December for New Orleans, where they will embark in the fine ocean-going yacht recently purchased by Mr. Spreckels from Senator Elkins of Virginia. The itinerary of the trip is to be of considerable extent, including both Atlantic and Pacific waters, and it is expected it will be some time in March before the party arrives in San Francisco bay. From New Orleans the yacht will cruise about the West Indies, along the South American coast, touching at Valparaiso and other points of interest, coming through the straits and up the Pacific coast.

The Truxtun Beales in Washington

It is probably news to most friends of the Truxtun Beales in this city that the former minister to Persia and his charming wife are to make their home in the national capital. The fine old mansion known as the Decatur House, a landmark of Washington, is being smartened up and will shelter them this winter. The old home of General Edward Fitzgerald Beale was willed to his son and in turn must pass to Truxtun's oldest son whose mother was the first Mrs. Truxtun Beale, James G. Blaine's daughter Harriet. There is a strong undercurrent of sympathy for Hattie Blaine Beale in Washington, the troubles which led to her divorce having been blamed upon her husband by those who professed to know. Mrs. Beale's sister, Miss Oge, is with the family in Washington. It is said that they will entertain lavishly.

A Renoite Invited

The fact that the name of Wade Chance, erstwhile of New York but more recently of Reno, appeared in the list of those invited to one of the most exclusive of our recent dancing parties, furnishes interesting matter for speculation. For Wade Chance came west to obtain freedom from the marital bonds that link him to the elderly Mrs. Van Rensselaer Cruger of New York. He is a Renoite in the special sense which restricts that word to those who take up a six months' residence in the mountain town for the alleviation of matrimonial suffering. That he should be invited to step within the small corral which holds our most exacting fashionables establishes a precedent. There are many charming people sojourning at Reno for the same purpose which drew Wade Chance thither. Are they likewise eligible for recognition in our society? Many of them are capable of adding zest, if not tone, to its assemblies.

The Very Latest Tipple

Masculine and feminine clubdom is deeply agitated by the reports of returning tourists that the only proper beverage in the best London clubs is—barley water! No more whisky and soda; no more gin and seltzer; no more sherry and biters; no more liqueurs; no more ale and stout; no more wines, but plain barley-water before, during and after dinner. The reports, alas! are correct. Dagonet Sims, the editor of "Living London" and the most up-to-date of British bards, bursts wildly into song:

If the spirits of members, who long since departed,
At midnight return to their clubs in the West,
How the shades of the Dandies and Bucks must have started

At the tippie our johnnies consume with a zest!
Oh, the groaning of ghosts there must be when we say,

Barley-water's the drink of the Bloods of today!

The marvelous change of tippie is not due to a temperance movement or to considerations of health, but is the result of the general devotion to bridge. Experts hold that, since the addition of the auction has given bridge the gambling facilities of poker, besides the scientific characteristic of old whist, it is impossible to play well without a clear head and steady nerves. This may be true, but there is the other side of the question to be considered. The main revenue of clubs, next to the annual dues, comes from the sale of bibables. If barley-water is to be the only club drink, then the price per glass must be the same as that of the old liquors and liqueurs, in order to show the necessary profit in the Superintendent's monthly statement to the Board of Directors.

An Impressionistic Painting

In the lobby of the St. Francis is displayed a picture placarded with the announcement that Lester D. Boronda, a "California artist," is about to give an exhibition in the hotel. The picture is a thing of amazing colors, neither earth nor sky showing the tints one usually sees in nature. An attenuated tree trunk in the foreground is crowned with an umbrella-shaped spread of leaves and branches, green at the edge but catsup red in the middle. A young lady stood regarding this curious work a few evenings ago and then turned to the man beside her with a puzzled air. "What do you think of it?" he asked. "It looks like cauliflower au bordelais," she answered.

Mr. and Mrs. Fletcher Ryer entertained delightfully at dinner Saturday evening in the small red room of the Fairmont, the affair being in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Harry MacFarland of Honolulu who have been extensively entertained during their visit in San Francisco.

They Saw Her Hobble Garters

If several young society swells should compliment a beautiful and stunning debutante by saying, "I think your hobble hand embroidered garters are really the handsomest I have seen," society would be shocked, but just the same these society chaps would be speaking by the card. This is how it happened. A certain stately and interesting debutante celebrated her nineteenth birthday recently at a jolly but informal luncheon. As she is extremely popular the presents were numerous, ranging from flowers and candy to more substantial tokens. During luncheon the door bell rang furiously and a messenger handed the maid a dainty package wrapped in tissue paper tied with pink ribbons. The debutante untied the package for the purpose of exhibiting the gift, but after taking a peep at the contents she changed her mind and no persuasion could induce her to proceed. Naturally she was joked by all the beaux and belles present, but she stoutly refused to appease their curiosity. At length her irrepressible young brother aged nine years snatched the mysterious package and for the edification of the young men present, displayed a beautiful set of hand embroidered hobble garters, while the young girls ran screaming from the table.

Men Scarce at the Greenway

The chill of the last Greenway is not yet dissipated. Debutantes in furs will shiver when they think of it. There were six girls to every man, not strung along like wall flowers on a trellis but gathered in forlorn little groups that sought companionship of one another in the fearful isolation that threatened. Not until too late were the conditions realized. There were a dozen dinners before the dance and when invitations to them were declined by one man after the other because he was not included among the Greenway guests, the hostesses began to compare notes. Most of them had had the same experience and it began to look as though a very limited number of men had been invited to the Czar's birthday celebration. On the day of the dance an anxious mother of a debutante telephoned Greenway and told him she wanted cards for several men who would be her dinner-guests. Then she telephoned other mothers and they did the same thing. But it was too late to avert the frost. A few bachelors were gathered in and did the best they could but were too greatly out-numbered. The married crowd enjoyed itself staidly but the younger set suffered. With all his experience and aplomb Greenway should not have allowed this to happen. Is it possible that he is growing careless with years? There were an even number of married people but a score of debutantes for whom twice as many dancing should have been provided for. That is to say, it looked that way; but when a Greenway fails of complete success, it is perhaps wise to look to the invited guests, not to the Czar, for the cause.

Society on Parade

For me the beautiful kalcidoscopic tableaux of the Imperial Russian Ballet at the Valencia Theater last Monday night were marred by some of the unbecomly personages of our provincial aristocracy. The boxes were crowded with them, and several of them insisted either on getting into the picture during the performance or immediately succeeding the stage picture as soon as the curtain dropped. Judging from the manners of some of the people in the boxes they went to the theater not so much for the purpose of seeing the performance as for the purpose of forming part of the spectacle. Their attitudinizing was almost as demonstrative as that of the radiant and pretty dancers on the stage. And the sad part of it was that most of them have ceased to be interesting. They came out long before Mr. Greenway needed a stimulant for his enthusiasm, and they have ceased to harmonize with their millinery. The kittenishness of them in this day and generation is an anachronism.

The Colonial Dames of America will hold their annual breakfast at the Fairmont the first week in December.

They Were Jealous of the Teacher

The "Boston" or "Harvard" dance, which is all the rage in the East, has been slow in reaching this city. In fact I heard a young girl remark that for some reason nearly all our young ladies here are timid about taking the initiative in introducing it. It is a slow dreamy dance, calculated to make the hobble skirt look more or less attractive; but it is not pronounced a graceful dance by our critical belles. It remained for Miss Margaret Roosevelt, who came here for Christine Pomeroy's wedding, to bring it out at the Century Club last Friday night. She took delight in teaching many of the young men the intricacies of the "short step" but was soon surrounded by so many pupils that several other girls who did not relish her unsought monopoly of the men, banded together to break up the impromptu class in the corner where the fair visitor spent the greater part of the evening. Thus do petty jealousies hinder the great work of education.

Cinderellas More Exclusive This Year

The announcement that the Cinderellas will repeat the brilliant success of their ball last year has been received with delight. It is said a somewhat more rigorous censorship of the invitation list will prevail this year. Before the ball given last January it was intended to keep the affair more exclusive than the Colonial or the Patronesses' dances at the St. Francis. The names submitted by subscribers were carefully gone over. But by the week of the ball the list had got beyond the committee. Requests for invitations for friends and the friends of friends came so thick and fast that a far greater crowd was in attendance than had been counted on. There were several guests in particular whose presence was much commented on. I am assured that no question of fitness to attend the Menlo set soiree will attach to any guest present this year.

The Inactive Blingumites

As for the Blingumite set it has been conspicuous by its inactivity this season. Mrs. Henry T. Scott and the mesdames Taylor who were leading spirits in promoting the late Patronesses' balls have said nothing of plans for others to come. These affairs which were given no designative name were the most elaborate subscription dances society has known. The comparative simplicity of the Greenways beside them was marked. It is a pity if they are not to be repeated. However with the Tevis, Sharon Thomas, and Doe balls in prospect, with the Greenways, Gayeties and Cinderellas there will probably be enough dancing until Lent.

The Reorganized Gayety

The reorganized Gayety Club is the most interesting feature of the season's program so far. The Irwin-Crocker wedding will doubtless dwarf everything when its turn comes, but that is still several months down the list. The Gayety dances are at once the jolliest and most exclusive parties of the year and membership in the club insures a girl's position and popularity. One member is hostess on each occasion and if there is no ball room in her home the dance may take place at Century Hall. One of the members admitted this year is Miss Agnes Tillman who will doubtless preside at a meeting, as the Tillmans have one of the largest private ball-rooms in town. Miss Gertrude Thomas is another new member whose

In the Social Spotlight

Colonel and Mrs. D. S. Dorn and family are stopping at the Fairmont for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Emil Pohli and their sons have left their Mill Valley bungalow and are again settled in their own home on Ashbury Heights.

Otto Wix, the well known artist, has taken apartments at the Hotel Von Dorn for the winter.

On account of the Kirmess in San Jose the cotillon at the Hotel Vendome which was to have been held tonight, has been postponed until Thursday, December 1.

Mr. and Mrs. Downey Harvey have come up from Del Monte and are guests at the home of Mrs. Eleanor Martin.

Miss Marguerite Doe, a debutante of the season, entertained a group of friends at the Palace Thursday for luncheon.

One of the first of the large functions of December will be the dinner dance to be given at the Fairmont, December 8, by Mrs. William S. Tevis. The affair will serve to introduce formally to society Miss Ysobel Chase, one of the season's debutantes. The guests will number 125 and dancing will follow the dinner in the red room.

Richard Tobin was a dinner host at the Palace Monday when his guests were Lansing Mizner, Princess David Kawanakoa and Miss Helen Gray.

Miss Marguerite Doe, the pretty young debutante daughter of Mrs. Eleanor Doe, will make her formal bow to society, December 9, at a handsome ball to be given at the Fairmont by her mother. Mrs. Doe has arranged for a reception at which her daughter will be introduced, to be followed by an elaborate dinner, and later dancing in the blue and gold ball room of the hotel.

The Cinderellas have decided on January 6 as the date for their annual dancing party. The dance will be given at the Fairmont instead of at the Palace, as was the former custom. The dance will be an unusually large and brilliant affair and will be attended by all the daughters of the original Cinderellas who are in town.

Fred Hall and his daughter, Miss Myra Hall, are occupying a suite of apartments at the Fairmont where they will spend the winter. Miss Hall has been visiting her grandmother in Washington since her graduation from an eastern school, and her return to San Francisco is being greatly enjoyed by her many friends in the debutante set.

Recent San Francisco arrivals at Hotel del Coronado included: A. Faget, Mr. and Mrs. F. T. Smith, Bruce Fair, A. J. Howell, Henry Stanford, P. F. Brown, Oakland; Beverly L. Hodges, C. F. Weiland, J. J. Jessop, Berkeley; Mr. and Mrs. S. M. White, Oakland.

Mrs. Edgar Preston entertained with an elaborate supper party at the Fairmont during the week, the function being given in honor of Mr. and Mrs. William Faversham (Julie Opp). Those attending included Mr. and Mrs. Frank Preston, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Foster Dutton, Mr. and Mrs. Harry MacFarland of Honolulu, Mrs. Willard Drown, Miss Virginia Jolliffe, Miss Mary Jolliffe, Worthington Ames, Dick Tobin, Barbour Lathrop, Thornwell Mullally, John Lawson, Knox Maddox and Dr. Tracy Russell.

Col. Burt B. Bloom and family of Denver are registered at the Hotel Von Dorn.

Dr. and Mrs. J. L. Hardin of Pleasant Grove are staying at the Hotel Von Dorn.

Mr. R. K. Scarlett, one of the representative men of Vancouver, spent last week at Del Monte, his trip from the north being partly on business and partly for pleasure.

Dr. Harold Sidebotham of Santa Barbara and Dr. Philip Chandelor of Pasadena, both very popular socially and very prominent professionally, motored up from the south to spend the week-end at Del Monte.

Mr. A. C. Steven of San Francisco was among the week-end guests at Del Monte, bringing with him Mr. O. R. Rowley of Montreal.

Edward H. Moloney, rector of St. Mary's-by-the-Sea, and Chaplain of Del Monte Chapel, lunched at Del Monte last week with some of his friends.

B. A. Harrington of San Jose, formerly District Attorney of Santa Clara County, and Mrs. Harrington were guests at the Von Dorn for a few days this week.

Mrs. Mountford S. Wilson graciously presided over the dinner party Monday evening at the Palace to which Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Knight had invited half a dozen friends to share their hospitality. Shortly before the dinner hour Mr. Knight was stricken with appendicitis and Mrs. Knight, unwilling to call off her dinner party at the last moment and disappoint her guests, requested Mrs. Wilson to take her place as hostess.

Captain B. W. Olson, U. S. N. and Mrs. Olson are stopping at the Palace for a few weeks.

Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Foster will come to San Francisco for the holiday season and to attend the next Greeway assembly. They will be at their apartments at the Fairmont. Preceding the assembly, December 23, Mrs. Foster will entertain with an elaborate dinner party in the gray room of the hotel, her guests later attending the dance.

Mrs. Veronica Baird has returned from abroad and will spend the winter in San Francisco. Mrs. Baird is established at the Palace, where she is receiving her friends.

Among those registered at the Hotel Von Dorn this week were Mr. and Mrs. E. M. Burroughs, Colusa; Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Thomas, Los Angeles; Mrs. J. V. Abbey, Mrs. G. H. Doerr, Seattle; Mr. and Mrs. R. H. Rudd, Sacramento.

The Russian Dancers

By Theodore Bonnet

To paraphrase the most popular of poets, the one that hath not a taste for the posturing and prouetting of the Imperial Russian Ballet, that is not moved by the sweet rhythms of sound and motion through which musicians and dancers delight both eye and ear, is fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils. This is really a great troupe of dancers that has come to us from Russia. The spectacle they present is a most sumptuous feast for the eye, colorful to bewilderment, intoxicating as wine. In tone it is decidedly Oriental, especially, of course, in the Arabian Night's pantomime, which abounds in suggestions of Solomon's seraglio. The dancing is of the kind, perhaps, that was brought to perfection by the Nubian girls of the Cataracts or the Bacchantes of Lydia. There is a hint of the voluptuous posturing by which, the poets tell us, the fair Salome ravished the senses of the Sybarite of Judea, and there is much of daintiness and chaste abandon to send your thoughts back to the gardens of Greece when Beauty was an article of faith, to the salons of Lesbos when the poets sang of the enchantments of Calypso and the sorceries of Circe. We are told that this is illustrative dancing, that there is much of symbolism in it as well as what is interpretative of music. But it is sufficiently satisfying to give oneself up to the enjoyment of it as a colorful spectacle. I have yet to be converted to the high-brow theory that you can unite in a single whole the manifestations of several arts. It is hard to understand how the demands of one art can realize the demands of other arts. Even in opera it seems to me the dramatic yields to the musical, and much more so in the domain of Terpsichore does the musical yield to the art of bodily expression. The movements of the dancers are not the expression of the inspired feeling of the musical composers, but rather of the inspired feeling of the dancers themselves. The music inspires them but not necessarily with the feelings of the composer. But enough of technical speculation; the Russian Imperial Ballet is enjoyable enough from any viewpoint, and the principals live up to the encomiums of their most enthusiastic admirers. Pavlova is a woman of exquisite charms of person whose "every movement has a meaning of its own." If gracefulness be the outward expression of the inward harmony of the soul she is kin to the seraphs. It is therefore incredible—what the newspapers say—that the deadly venom exuded by the green-eyed monster is preying on her vitals. She has really no reason to be jealous of Mordkin's wife. But why should Mordkin have a wife? This Russian Apollo whose business it is to delight the public with the graces of his person and the poetry of his motions is too beautiful to be the exclusive possession of any one. Besides the idea of domesticity does not harmonize with the picturesqueness of his personality. This divinely formed dancer who scintillates like a polished epigram is the very incarnation of Young Love. One expects him to be flashing forever like a flame, but never deep-burning like the coals of matrimony.

De Wolf Hopper and Louise Dresser

By Edward F. O'Day

When the compounders of musical comedy does fling Moliere into their mortar their pestle is likely to crush out an agreeable mixture. It so completely impregnates all the works of the Frenchman that it may be counted on to for this once. Hopper and Hein are the lions of the pleasant function at the Savoy. Hopper's fun set to Hein's music is irresistible and the continuous vocal accompaniment of laughter from the other side of the footlights is the most sensible criticism to which the piece could be subjected. It is to laugh from the first appearance to the last exit of the giant comedian. The laughter traverses a scale from titters to giggles and from giggles to roars. It is spontaneous, unaffected and healthy. It lubricates the risorial muscles and induces a pleasant aching of the sides. It makes the bachelor forget his creditors and the married man the high cost of bonnets. It lulls to repose the maiden's fear of spoiling her complexion and the matron's terror of bursting her corsets. It chases the gloomy specters conjured by Ibsen and Schnitzler and takes the sting out of living. To evoke such laughter is the supreme reason for the existence of musical comedy. Also it is the life work of De Wolf Hopper—and his has been a successful career. He has not always had such a happy instrument to play upon as "A Matinee Idol." Add De Wolf Hopper to funny lines, funny situations and melodious music and what more would you want? But there is more. There is Louise Dresser, with her amplitude of blond beauty, her seductive eyes and her engaging way of using a voice that is not remarkable for its technical qualities. In her burlesque scenes with Hopper she left nothing to be desired. Then there is Miss Dorothy Webb, one of the nimblest little high kickers imaginable. And there is Mr. Georgie Mack whose inches are an admirable foil to Hopper's altitude. And there is the chorus of seminary girls who display a collection of legs admirable from every point of view. If trailing gowns are meant to hide legs their purpose is defeated by these generous young ladies, a fact which may worry the dressmakers but which affords unbounded satisfaction to the masculine spectators. In conclusion let me not forget to mention that the audience, having refrained from demanding "Casey at the Bat," was rewarded for its forbearance by the funniest curtain speech heard here since poor old Ezra Kennedy passed away.

Battle," Cleveland Moffett's widely discussed play of modern American life in which Wilton Lackaye is now starring. sweeten any concoction into which it is transfused. It has done a great deal for "A Matinee Idol," the authors of which acknowledge their indebtedness in the program. But Moliere's wit had nothing to do with inspiring Silvio Hein in the composition of the music for "A Matinee Idol" and it had nothing to do with making De Wolf Hopper one of the best of our musical comedians. So Moliere must take a back seat

Stage

Lora Lieb's Liberation

An actress's first venture in masculine masquerade is an epoch in her life. To doff feminine gear and don trousers is to tempt the capricious deity that presides over theatrical success, for it is almost like beginning a stage career all over again. The habits of a lifetime cannot easily be put off with a petticoat; no more easily can a new mumming method be put on with a pair of pants. Yet that is what the stage director demands when he requires an actress to garb herself as a man. Obviously he is asking a great deal, for an actress may be irresistibly charming as she comes from the hands of her modiste and still lose all her fascination when her personality is submerged in small clothes. If her personality survives this ordeal, she is entitled to exactly double the praise which she deserves when she is seen in her proper person. Miss Lora Lieb I have only seen twice on the stage. Captivated the first time by her feminine fascination, I was subdued the second time by her masculine masquerade. In "The White Hen" I was convinced of her musical comedy ability; in "The Girl and the Baron" I saw unmistakable evidence of her versatility. Although Miss Lieb has had a successful career on Broadway, she had to come to San Francisco to wear trousers. "The Girl and the Baron" has brought her this new experience. It may seem strange that a musical comedy actress of Broadway antecedents should never have encased herself in the trappings of the dominant sex, but that is the fact and it is susceptible of explanation. Miss Lieb is an artist in clothes.

She is the glass of fashion and the mold of form. She dresses in the forefront of stylish taste. The couturiers cannot invent anything which Miss Lieb cannot adapt swiftly and charmingly to her dashing personality. So the stage directors of Broadway never thought of divorcing her from her fashion plates. But Frank Stammers, the stage director at the Garrick, is a man of untrammelled ideas and he put Miss Lieb into trousers in the second production of the Max Dill season. He accomplished Miss Lieb's liberation. The word is gratuitous. It may be an insult or it may be an inspiration; I am not sure. But it is used because I cannot help thinking that the tyranny of continually shifting fashions must become unbearable to an able actress whose ambition soars above the arts of the costumer. In other words I suspect that Miss Lieb was grateful for the opportunity to disguise her sex in a soldier's uniform. I judge entirely from her conduct on the stage. She put on new vivacity with her military togs. Her mannish stride seemed to carry her many steps forward in her work. She charmed in an entirely new way. This was no mean feat, for Miss Lieb was required by the plot of the piece—"The Girl and the Baron" actually has a plot of ascertainable size—to change from skirts to trousers and back again. To be alternately man and woman in one play is a difficult business, but Miss Lieb accomplished it with apparent ease. In an excellent production she is entitled to particular praise.

The Airy Fairy One Approaches

Lillian Russell begins her San Francisco engagement at the Columbia on Monday night, November 28, and continues for two weeks with the usual matinees. Her offering this year will be a new comedy from the pen of Charlotte Thompson which is called "In Search of a Sinner." It possesses local interest, as Miss Thompson was long identified with the newspapers and magazines of this city before venturing into the fields of dramatic authorship. Miss Russell is said to be doing the best work of her career in this new endeavor. Joseph Brooks has surrounded her with an unusually strong company and a production that is more than pretentious. Of course the fair Lillian will enliven these stage pictures with a number of stunning gowns. The seat sale for the engagement which promises to be one of the treats of the season opens at the Columbia Thursday morning.

The Tetrizzini Concerts

Mme. Luisa Tetrizzini arrived in New York Thursday from Italy and is now en route to this city. Manager W. H. Leahy is with the party and the great diva is assured of a warm welcome at the hands of all musical San Francisco. The Dreamland Rink will be beautifully decorated and heated for the Tetrizzini concerts which are scheduled for Tuesday and Thursday nights, December 6 and 8, and Saturday afternoon, December 10. Mons. Andre Benoist, formerly with Mme. Nordica, Ysaye and other great stars, has een engaged as accompanist. Mr. Walter Oeserriecher will travel as the flute soloist so necessary to many of Tetrizzini's beautiful coloraturas and an accomplished singer whose name we have not yet received will be included in the party that will tour from this city to the Atlantic Coast.

Broadhurst's Latest at Alcazar

With a ten weeks' run in Los Angeles and a brilliant New York season to its credit, "The Dollar Mark" will be given its first presentation in San Francisco next Monday evening at the Alcazar. It was written by George H. Broadhurst, author of "The Man of the Hour" and other very successful plays. As its title implies, "The Dollar Mark" treats of this country's exaltation of Mammon and the human injustice that results. But with the main theme of money-worship there are interwoven two very interesting love stories and a marital misunderstanding, so the play appeals to both sexes. In the cast are all the regular members of the Alcazar company and several extra actors.

Another Week of Hopper

De Wolf Hopper and his company, including Louise Dresser, will give their second matinee performance of "A Matinee Idol" at the Savoy this Saturday afternoon and on Sunday night will begin the second and last week of their engagement. For the second and last week Miss Dresser will introduce two of her greatest song successes, "Queenie Was There With Her Hair in a Braid" and "Put on Your Slippers, You're in for the Night." Beginning Sunday night, December 4, "The Kissing Girl," another musical comedy with Texas Guinan in the titular role, will begin an engagement of one week.

The Imperial Russian Ballet

The final performances of Anna Pavlova and Mikail Mordkin with the Imperial Russian Ballet and orchestra will be given at the Valencia this Saturday night and Saturday and Sunday afternoons. "The Arabian Nights" will be the offering Friday night and at the Saturday matinee and "Giselle" will be the ballet for the other two performances. The great specialties of Pavlova and Mordkin will be given at each.

Ellen Terry Matinee

Theatergoers of this city will have an opportunity to enjoy the brilliant discourse by Ellen Terry and her illustrative acting of many of Shakespeare's roles at the Columbia next Thursday afternoon, December 1. This will be the first appearance here of the greatest of living English actresses for many years. Miss Terry will give her interesting performances of a number of roles, such as Portia, Beatrice, Rosalind, Viola, Volumnia and Virgilia. There is a big demand for seats.

Emilio De Gogorza is Coming

All lovers of beautiful singing will be delighted to learn that Signor Emilio De Gogorza, the famous Spanish baritone, is to be heard in two concerts at the Columbia Theater, the dates being two Sunday afternoons, December 11 and 18. De Gogorza always offers programs of unusual interest, beauty and variety. All summer he has been abroad delving into the song literature of many countries and he promises some new and modern Spanish, Italian, German, French and English works in addition to many of the standard classics. While in Paris De Gogorza met a young French pianist named Robert Schmitz who had just taken first prize at the Conservatoire. He immediately engaged him as accompanist and soloist for his American tour.

Attractions of the Orpheum

The Orpheum program for next week will be headed by William Farnum who is perhaps best remembered for his performance of Ben Hur. He will appear in Edward Peple's little classic, "The Mallet's Masterpiece" which affords him a splendid opportunity. The famous Duffin-Redcay Troupe will amaze with its "casting" act which is sure to prove a sensation. The Meredith Sisters have several pictorial songs. "Radiant" Radie Furnam, a petite singing comedienne, has new songs and character make-ups and a number of beautiful costumes. Next week will be the last of James Callahan and Jenny St. George, Andree's Studies in Porcelain, The Temple Quartette and The Six Musical Cuttys.

Not to be Fooled

Proudly young Tomkins displayed the sights of London to his uncle, fresh from the verdant country. They visited St. Paul's and the Embankment and the National Gallery and all the places they could get in free, and, as an especial treat, they visited a music hall, where a trombone solo was in progress when they entered.

With rapt attention the old man watched the instrumentalist's facial contortions. At the close the audience applauded thunderously, but the old man sat mute.

"Well," said young Tomkins, "didn't you like it?"

"Verra good, verra good, no doubt," nodded the old man, "but we country folk canna be taken in so easy as all that; I knew all the time he wasn't a-swallowin' of it!"

The Financial Outlook

By R. E. Mulcahy

Stocks—Very little feature in last week's stock market with bulk of transactions confined to the floor of the exchange. Banking interests were credited with having done very little, apparently being content to await further advices from London on the election and probably to hold aloof from advancing prices in view of the growing tension between the United States and Mexico. It was anticipated in some quarters that the speech of Chairman Knapp of the Interstate Commerce Commission Tuesday night would develop considerable market activity as early advices as to this speech would indicate favorable action of the commission toward railways in the matter of rates. Leading interests here continue to look favorably toward the future of the security market though betterment may be slow.

Wheat—Anxiety concerning the outcome of the Argentine wheat crop was displayed in the markets of the world the last week. Selling pressure was removed to a considerable extent while the demand has hardened. Gains however were unimportant, as thus far it seems there is no real reason for alarm. Speculative interest in wheat has been small for months and promises to remain so until something tangible and of enough importance to claim the public attention develops. Even with much development there would be no real cause for anxiety on the part of the consumers. Supplies of wheat and flour in trade channels the world over are enormous and there is nothing to warrant the consumer changing from his present policy of buying to supply immediate needs only. With merchandising on only the normal consuming basis it will be a slow task to materially deplete available supplies. With navigation closing in ten days and the January first financial round up at hand it is barely possible that supplies in Chicago will be materially reduced. Primary receipts continue to show a considerable falling off. Lack of demand is something of a factor in this, but the falling off may materially affect values in this country in the long run.

Corn—Values have declined in the last week more than corn has improved. Fine weather with fears of an early movement of the new crop along with the fact that shipping sales have only been moderate, have counted against values. Many believe that corn is low enough for the present and that a good movement from the country might not have the depressing effect that the pessimistic speculator has counted on. It is expected that corn marketings will show quite an increase this week. General complaint of car scarcity and slow rail service is heard from country dealers and the trade looks forward with apprehension to a repetition of last year's troubles in this respect.

Cotton—An effort has been made to educate the trade into the belief that the census report

Monday should be very large, about 9,000,000 to 9,100,000 bales, and that such a report would be bullish. In order to realize such figures 1,700,000 bales would have to be ginned in 11 days. To say that this would be bullish is rather extreme as the largest amount ever ginned in this period was only 1,655,000 bales in twelve days in 1906 when the crop turned out to be 13,511,000 bales. A conservative estimate for the next report would be about 8,740,000 bales which would be the second largest on record and on the basis of 70 per cent of the crop would point to a crop of about 12,500,000 bales. Last year only 1,094,350 bales were ginned from November 1 to 14, and in 1907 another small crop year, only 1,172,103 bales were ginned, yet the crop that year was 11,572,000 bales. The crop this year is a late one in all sections except Texas and Oklahoma but is by no means a small one. As to the freeze we quote Mr. Cordills: "We had in 1906 temperatures of 28 degrees in South Carolina on October 11, and 29 degrees on October 12, and temperatures in Georgia of 30 and 31 degrees on October 11 and 12, of 29 degrees in Alabama, 31 and 32 in Arkansas and 30 in Oklahoma. 1906 was certainly not an early crop. In 1907 on October 14, 15 and 16 we had temperatures of 31 to 32 and 33 degrees in Mississippi, Georgia, Alabama and the Carolinas. And 1907 was an extremely late crop, particularly in Texas, Oklahoma, Arkansas, Mississippi and Louisiana." Spinners are being impressed by the larger holdings of farmers which are figured at about 600,000 bales more than at this time last year. Advices from the interior are to the effect that the demand from mills recently has been poor and while holders thus far have only been offering moderately, larger offerings are looked for in the near future unless the demand for cotton increases.

Local Securities—There has been more to the local market for stocks and bonds during the past week or so than has been the case for some time. The stock group presents a number of very encouraging features. California Wine common is a very strong spot, its advance being caused, it is said, on the news of the prospects for the Association's future earnings becoming brighter each day. The fact that California Wine preferred goes on a 6 per cent dividend basis early next year is also having a healthy effect on the common stock. Spring Valley Water is another active feature of the local dealings, having had a gain of a point or so. While there has been no news of a decisive character on the Water Company's affairs, it is generally supposed that negotiations are about to be reopened with the city for the purchase of the plant. City Electric stock has had a very quick rise and in absence of any published developments in that company, it is expected that some sort of an announcement as regards increased dividends is soon to be given out. Pacific Gas & Electric common has once again made a new high record price and seems to be in a position to go a great deal higher. The street generally looks for 6 per cent dividends on the stock commencing early next year. Other firm features in the local market are California Fruit Canners' Association, Pacific Coast Borax, Pacific Telephone stocks and Fireman's Fund. Of the local bonds there is little to say outside of continued steadiness in the list with the main advance in Spring Valley Water general mortgage 4s. As published in these columns, a week or so ago, the opinion is still held that Spring Valley, California Wine, Pacific Telephone, Pacific Gas & Electric and Western Power stock are all bound for higher prices between now and the end of the year and, by its steadier tone during the past few days, it is felt that Associated Oil may be added to this list.

deep growl, as of wild beasts, and the detective whispered: "We'll have to get out of here, quick!"

The party lost no time in descending the narrow stairway. The little baroness begged her husband to take her home at once. The men hesitated and consulted together, but the duchess was obdurate. She had started on this expedition and she was determined to finish it.

They went to other places. Some were in cellars, others in garrets. The duchess was somewhat perplexed, for she had remarked that this young poet, as she chose to call him, had followed her everywhere. "Is it because he wants to assassinate me or because he has fallen in love with me?" she asked herself.

They had had their fill of human misery; they had breathed into their lungs the nauseating odor of suffering and crime until it had reached their hearts. And now a hand, probably that of an ex-convict, reached out and pinched the little baroness. She kept very quiet, fearing that any objection on her part might be followed by her immediate assassination.

"Ha, ha!" laughed a broad-shouldered man, clad only in a pair of trousers and an undershirt. "You seem to be putting on airs tonight, baby!"

Another man leaned over against the duchess and blowing his fetid breath into her face, said hoarsely: "This is a fine girl." And he drew his stool up close to her, and put his arm about her waist.

"This certainly is delicious," said the duchess to herself, "this sensation of being close to an assassin!" And then she shivered with horror at the thought of all the things that contact with such a man might mean. The men of the party flushed and were about to rise from their chairs when they noticed a look of terror in the eyes of the detective. A few moments later they quietly rose and left this place.

There was only one more thing left to see on this slumming expedition and that was the cheap lodging-house.

The baroness began to cry. "Oh, please don't go there," she pleaded.

"Oh, it's not at all dangerous," said the detective, "they're all asleep."

They were asleep. This refuge or den opens at six o'clock in the evening and closes at six o'clock in the morning. For two cents a man may sleep there and for four he may receive in addition a glass of water and a piece of bread. Yes, they were sleeping, these human beasts, snoring and murmuring unheard-of oaths as they tossed about in a somnolence that was not rest. The first comers had taken possession of berths which resembled the stalls of horses, while others sat on stools by the long table, their heads buried in their folded arms. There were even some who lay under the tables, at the feet of those who sat, kicked now and then by the heavy shoes of the dreamers. It was a picture that even the pencil of a Dore might have failed to portray. There were faces and heads that reminded one of the guillotine. Now and then one of the sleepers would awaken and turn haggard eyes toward the duchess without seeing her. She was searching frantically for her lorgnette, for she did not wish to lose a single detail of this frightful scene. As all was very quiet and there seemed to be no danger, the slumming party exchanged some of their impressions in whispers:

"Oh, those horrible women with their hair all awry, and those rags and those awful faces! And that piano!" wailed the little baroness. "I wish I'd never come."

Suddenly the duchess started and gave the signal for departure, for she had just seen the poet, who was standing in one corner, looking fixedly at her.

A first night at the theater, a lecture at the Sorbonne, four teas, three interviews with the dress-maker and one with the dentist were sufficient in a few days to efface from the mind of the duchess the unpleasant impressions left by her journey through the slums. In a way she rather regretted the loss of these sensations, for they were at least novel and had made something of a break in her life of social routine. She had emerged from this bath in the Styx without any unfortunate results.

One night, when she had retired, she sincerely hoped that she would die. She looked like a beautiful flower as she lay there wrapped in the pink and white of her bed-coverings, but she writhed and wrung her little white hands, for she was suffering from the terrible malady of ennui. She feared, however, by a too sudden movement to rip the gloves which covered her hands bathed in cold cream, or to disarrange the bandages upon her face, bandages which were so efficacious in smoothing out wrinkles; and besides, she had a headache. She felt angry at her maid because she had drawn and pinned her hair too tightly. She thought of her forty-four years, many of the days devoted to dissipation which had left its inexorable traces. The blond hair was

"Those Lustrous Eyes are Beauty's Eyes Murine Eyes"

When Beauty's Eyes upon me rest,
A strange sweet thrill darts thro' my breast,
As though a perfumed, winged dart
Had pierced the region of my heart.

But oh, what anguish, what dismay,
When Beauty frowns or turns away,
When Beauty laughs, I know not why
My hopes fall earthward from the sky.

Alas, I feel how far above
My wild ambition is her love.
But when those Eyes are Bathed in tears
The crystal drops dispel my fears.

When Beauty's Eyes are closed in sleep,
Earth's loneliness o'er me creep.
Without those Eyes to shape my mood,
The world is filled with solitude.

And when they open fair again,
Life, joy and music fill my brain.
'Tis strange indeed what power lies Within the depth of Beauty's Eyes.

My acts, my thoughts, my life control,
Those Witching Orbs command my soul.
And yet, again, their glances mild
Would soothe to sleep a fretful child.

FROM GOLF LINKS TO OFFICE

MANY a man would be unable to enjoy the healthful exercise of golf if the telephone did not keep him in touch with his business.

A word over the wires saves him an hour's delay in leaving the office. There is another reason.

The busy man's day is made shorter by the Bell Service, which brings him in instant communication, not only with his fellow townsmen, but with correspondents in distant cities.

The Bell System provides universal service to meet the needs of all users.

The

growing gray about her temples and, in spite of masseurs and fashionable corset-makers, her once beautiful form had lost its perfect curves.

"After all," she thought, "is life worth living?"

Finally, she slept, but awoke with a start. What time was it? No ray of daylight penetrated through the windows, and the tiny flame of the night-lamp cast vague shadows. As the duchess opened her eyes widely, and looked about her, terror seemed to turn her to stone. All around her bed stood human beings, with arms crossed, looking at her in silence.

She had no strength to cry out or call for help. She had but one idea: "Thieves!"

Sitting up in bed, she peered about the room. The apartment was filled with them, all standing erect, silent, their arms crossed. She became aware of a sickening odor of misery and crime. Her nostrils and mouth were filled with the stench and it penetrated to her heart.

She turned to the electric button and would have pushed it, but a voice spoke loudly:

"Don't become excited, madame."

Strange as it may seem, she had never heard that voice before and yet she recognized it. The intonation was so perfect, the accent so ironical that the words could emanate only from the poet who had so obstinately followed her through the slums. Now she understood! He had followed her to her home, had taken an impression of the keyhole and had been able to enter her room. Now he was there, before her with all his terrible companions, and she was to be assassinated then and there in her bed.

But the ironical voice continued, breaking in upon her thoughts. The red-headed man with the strange eyes did not move.

"Be quiet," he said; "we are not going to hurt you. You came to see us the other night—why should you be astonished if we return your visit? Every dog has his day. We took a fancy tonight to see how rich people live and how they look when they are asleep."

And then, without paying any further attention to the duchess, he turned to the haggard men and women who filled the room and began to talk to them as if he were delivering a lecture:

"I wish to call your attention, ladies and gentlemen, to the question of make-up. Note the baldness of this woman. It is a subject of great interest, I assure you. You remark that even when these women are in bed they are masked as they are in their automobiles. You see that they have a natural tendency to be monkeys a great part of their lives. How many hours during the day do you suppose they show their true selves?"

The duchess at last recovered her self-control. She turned and pushed at random one of the buttons on the wall, at the same time uttering a cry for help which rasped her throat.

Instantly the white and pink room was lighted by the brilliant electric lamps and from every side there arose a horrible laugh, the hoarse tones of the males mingling with the higher notes of the females. The specters bent their heads so far back, their hideous mouths opening in a gape so uncanny that one could but think of the guillotine. The filthy women pointed their fingers at her and writhed in laughter.

The duchess, wide-eyed with terror, looked about her, lifting her gloved hands in despair. With her head swathed in bandages, her little braid of hair hanging behind, she appeared both repulsive and ridiculous. They were all pointing their fingers at her. Not a word did they say but merely looked and laughed and laughed!

Then the duchess awoke.

Breaking a Bad Habit

This one is told on an Oakland butcher. We shall call him Bill, because that is not his name.

A customer had gone into his shop to purchase a beef roast. Now, it seems that Bill used to have a most annoying habit (to the patrons) of bearing down with a heavy hand upon the scales. This high cost of living thing, and all that, were bad enough in all conscience, thought some of his patrons, but one of them finally broke Bill of this trick, and now he gives full weight every time.

As was stated, the customer was buying a beef roast and Bill slyly was helping out the work of the scales with one pudgy fist when before a shopful of people the buyer said:

"Take your hand off that scale, Bill. I'm buying beef, not pork."

Since then no one has had to chide Bill for a similar act.

PERFECTION SMOKELESS OIL HEATER

Staying Overnight

The guest who arrives upon short notice or the guest who for some reason unexpectedly stays overnight feels uncomfortable at any sign of extra effort or inconvenience on his account. In winter on such occasions there is often the question of quickly heating the "spare" room or guest chamber. You can avoid all trouble and inconvenience by taking your Perfection Oil Heater to his room. You can light the heater in a jiffy, and be back in a minute or two. When he goes to bed his room is warm, and the heat is under his own control—little or much, as he desires.

PERFECTION SMOKELESS OIL HEATER

Absolutely smokeless and odorless

The Perfection has an AUTOMATIC-LOCKING FLAME SPREADER, which prevents the wick from being turned high enough to smoke, and is easy to remove to clean and drop back. The burner body or gallery cannot become wedged, because of a new device in construction, and it can be easily and quickly unscrewed for rewicking.

An indicator shows the amount of oil in the font. Has a cool handle. Filler-cap is put in place like a cork in a bottle, and is attached to the font by a chain. Finished in Japan or nickel; strong and durable, well-made; built for service, and yet light and ornamental.

More completely than any other car has put the automobile on the basis of a practical utility.

Materials and construction as good as the best at a price low enough to come within the possibilities of the average business man is the secret of the Hudson's success.

Two Ways of Building a Low Priced Car

The most common way: First set the price and then build a car to come within the price.

THE HUDSON WAY: First build the car as well as materials and the best schooled experience in automobile construction will permit and then set the price as low as cost of building and marketing that car will justify.

That is why we say first in the Car and then in the Price the Hudson is the premier general utility car.

Auto Notes

Among the local firms which have been actively engaged in creating an Eastern sentiment in favor of San Francisco for the Panama-Pacific Exposition is the Chanslor & Lyon Motor Supply Co. This firm has sent out above 200 letters to their Eastern connections with markedly successful results. H. D. McCoy, secretary of the Chanslor & Lyon Supply Company, is now dictating a followup letter.

A long controversy as to what tires equip the two Haynes cars owned by ex-president Roosevelt has resulted in the Diamond Rubber Co. obtaining information showing that only Diamonds are or have been used on these cars. The report started to the effect that another make of tire was used by Roosevelt was due to a mistake.

At a recent meeting of the stock holders of the Western Pacific Motor Car Co. plans were laid for the coming season's campaign throughout their territory and an election of officers was held. The following well known business men of San Francisco, Oakland and Berkeley were elected: O. P. Hopkins, president and general manager; E. H. Lourey, vice-president; T. W. White, secretary and L. A. Carter, treasurer. The Western Motor Car Co., although but recently organized, has taken its place as one of the most potential firms in local automobile trade circles. The executive qualifications of the new officers combined with their understanding of the motor car business insures the company even greater future influence. Among other things the new officers made preparations for an excellent display of Inter-State and Warren-Detroit cars at the Oakland Automobile Show at Idora Park.

Wm. L. Harvey of the Weinstock Nichols Co's sales force has just returned from an extensive trip through northern California and Nevada. He reports that the appearance of the 1911 models has everywhere stimulated the automobile trade and that business in motoring accessories indicates much winter touring this season.

The Haynes Auto Sales Company reports the shipment of two 1911 model "20" cars to Honolulu. The Haynes has long been one of the favorite machines in the islands and is among the makes responsible for the growing popularity there of the American made car.

The Autocar Company has just published a well illustrated booklet devoted to the Philadelphia to Atlantic City Reliability Run for commercial cars. The Autocar truck entries were the sensational contenders of the day. All were entered by private owners.

"The fact that American roads are not as uniformly good as are the European roads undoubtedly accounts in a large degree for the widespread popularity of American made automobile tires abroad," says Keith E. Goode, manager of the Diamond tire distributing establishment in Paris. "Through the necessity of making tires to meet American road conditions the manufacturers have produced tires with several features not found in foreign makes which make them popular with the foreign motorists."

The recent establishment of their Oakland branch is indicative of the direct representation policy which the Haynes Auto Sales Co. proposes to establish in Alameda County. Speaking in this connection an official of that company said: "Experience has taught us the importance of handling the Haynes cars through branches under our immediate control, and managed not by agents working on commission, but by representatives employed on a straight salary basis by us. We have spared no pains in building up for ourselves a reputation of the most generous treatment for owners and we can best maintain this reputation by handling our branches directly through the local centers."

It was a happy inspiration which led Houghton, Mifflin and Co. to reissue John T. Trowbridge's classic "Darius Green and His Flying Machine" in a separate volume with appropriate illustrations by Walter Goldsmith. The poem made its first appearance forty years ago and achieved an immediate success. It has had its place in every volume of selections and has always been greeted with laughter and applause when recited in public. Darius Green has been quoted for nearly four decades as the type of an impractical visionary and perhaps in all that time there has not been a single youth who essayed anything out of the beaten track who has not been reminded that

"The' aint such a thunderin' sight
Of fun in't when you come to light.

And now, with flying machines of some sort or another almost a commonplace and State legislatures beginning to consider laws for the regulation of air-lanes, the heretofore laughing stock is recognized as a pioneer, half a century ahead of his time and like many a real hero, is coming in for a share of tardy justice. Mr. Trowbridge, the author, still lives, one of the few survivors of the New England coterie, and was recently an interested spectator of some feats of aviation.

Three Christmas stories of an unusual type, the work of Mrs. Charles J. Woodbury, have been put together in a dainty booklet with envelope to match, by the Paul Elder Company. The first, "The Potato Child," which will make its special appeal to girls, and which gives its name to the little booklet, is a chronicle of a forlorn little waif taken from a charitable institution to become a general utility in the home of a woman well enough to do but hard, and unloving in her disposition. Elsie herself was an affectionate little creature who, denied every other outlet, took into her heart a common potato which she conceived to bear a fanciful likeness to a childish face, and lavished all her love on her "potato child." The second, "A Story That Never Ends," is more especially a boy's story, while the third, "A Nazareth Night," presents a picture of a Christmas night in the household of the "Holy Family." A frontispiece illustrating the first book is from a bas relief by Elizabeth Ferrea. The form and size of the booklet make it especially convenient for mailing. It will be appreciated by any one of an age and with the taste to appreciate artistic finish.

The Impressions Calendar is even more attractive than usual this year. The arrangement of four leaves to each month gives abundant opportunity for using favorite quotations, especially those of R. L. S., who seems to grow in favor as time passes. Usually a calendar that is out of date is the most worthless piece of property one can own but it would be hard to imagine any one willing to cast aside an Impressions. It is one of the standard productions of the Paul Elder Company.

"The Hump Tree Stories," by Mary Jess Jones, with illustrations by R. L. Hudson, is designed for very young children who still like to be read to or to have stories told them. They are simple tales concerning grasshoppers, butterflies, frogs, squirrels and the smaller animals, and if the term had not acquired an evil significance, might be called nature stories. Like all the products of the Elder press, it is a piece of mechanical perfection, beautifully printed on tinted paper and almost too nice for any but the most dainty child to handle.

The Cynic's Calendar, which had become almost as familiar as an annual as the Hostetter's and Ayer's Almanacs, has this year given place to the "Complete Cynic," made up of cullings of the best of the perverted maxims and distorted proverbs from the various editions of the Calendar, with the illustrations which accompanied them and some additions. Almost a new generation has grown up since the first of the Cynic's Calendars made its appearance, and no doubt those who see for the first time this Complete Cynic will hail it with the same joy as did their elders the calendar back in 1902. The Paul Elder Company are, of course, its sponsors.

The Macmillan Company has added to its series of notable plays Stephen Phillips' "Pietro of Siena," this making the fifth of the author's works to be included, its predecessors being "Ulysses," "The Sin of David," "Nero" and "Faust."

The college freshman is provided for this year with his own private and particular book of advice, "Don'ts for College Freshmen." If there is any one subject upon which he feels competent to guide the world, it is in the matter of what and when and why to do or don't do things, so how the freshman himself will take this admonition is yet to be discovered, but any one who has one of the genus on the holiday list will be attracted by the neat little blue booklet appropriately decorated and George Fullertoe Evans may count on having his contribution as familiar as a text book. The Don't Books of a few years ago, gotten out for every possible contingency, seemed to have swept the field clear, but the collegian was overlooked. The Paul Elder Company have sponsored the booklet and it goes without saying that there is nothing that could be improved in the appearance of the little offering.

Legal Profundity

A newly made magistrate was gravely absorbed in a formidable document. Raising his keen eyes, he said to the man who stood patiently awaiting the award of justice: "Officer, what is this man charged with?"

"Bigotry, your worship. He's got three wives," replied the officer.

The new justice rested his elbows on the desk and placed his finger tips together. "Officer," he said, somewhat sternly, "what's the use of all this education, all these evening schools, all the technical classes an' what not? Please remember, in any future like case, that a man who has married three wives has not committed bigotry but trigonometry. Proceed."

"What shall we say of Senator Smugg?"

"Just say he was always faithful to his trust."

"And shall we mention the name of the Trust?"

What Mrs. Barker Found at Thousand Oaks

"I had looked at every residence district within a radius of 15 miles of San Francisco and decided on Thousand Oaks as soon as I saw it.

"Being a lover of nature, I am impressed with this delightful spot as soon as Mr. Newell showed me the property."

"I cannot imagine one wanting to live on a straight treeless street shut in from the view of our great bay, when such a place as Thousand Oaks is on the market at such reasonable prices.

"The giant oaks, the moss covered rocks, the little triangle parks, the unobstructed marine view, the build-

Elevating Expectation

Almost daily we are assured by the Boughten Bulletin that the administration of the Hon. Hiram Johnson is to be the best ever. This assurance from almost any other source would be delightful, but the endless iteration of it, whatsoever the source, cannot be productive of anything but a tired feeling. Speaking in Mr. Johnson's behalf, and none the less earnestly if without his authority, we would persuade his favorite journal to cease stimulating the expectation of the dear people. It is well enough for the people to have refreshing forethoughts of the Johnsonian dispensation, but it is unjust to Mr. Johnson to raise public expectation beyond the possibility of gratification. Doubtless our Governor-elect has been nourishing himself on good resolutions; the probability is that he has determined to give the people a clean and honest administration and fulfill as far as he is able the pledges that he has made; but let us not be induced to expect him to usher in the millennium. It would not tax our credulity to be informed that in the enthusiasm of the moment, inspired by the confidence of the people, Mr. Johnson is fairly bursting with ideals up to which he fondly expects to live. But at the same time we should regard it as unjust to him to make his expectation the expectation of the public. The public is unreasonable in that it regards a man as a hypocrit who does not live up to his ideals, which is something that no man who has very high ideals is ever able to do. Even saints have failed to practice all that they approved, the reason being that body and soul did not always pull together. The flesh of the best of us is weak however willing the spirit. So therefore we protest in Mr. Johnson's behalf against the prelibation of his reforms which the Boughten Bulletin has so repeatedly sought to give the dear people. Rather than have them expect too much we should have them prepared to be charitable.

A Paradoxical Complaint

Judge Seawell has sustained a demurrer to the complaint of the city in the suit to forfeit the franchise under which the United Railroads is operating horse cars in lower Market street. The language of the complaint, Judge Seawell says, is misleading. The statement of the cause of action he finds difficult of interpretation. Its author contradicts himself, and indulges in paradox for which Judge Seawell has no taste. He says the complaint almost reaches the point of saying just the opposite to what is meant, and he has therefore taken occasion to expatiate on elementary principles and to tell the Hon. Percy Long, the distinguished counsel for the city, how he should draw a complaint in order to make it intelligible. Now this is what comes of employing a trained lawyer as a judge and an inexperienced lawyer as a city attorney. Manifestly the principle of this system is all wrong. But it is characteristic of our haphazard way of doing business in all the departments of government. We are forever inventing devices to circumvent the ingenuities of our own rascality; eternally tinkering with the machinery of government, but never do we think of the importance of adapting the mentality of our servants to the business in hand. Almost everything is managed on the principle of employing a plumber to mend a watch. This is instanced in a measure in the case of the employment of Percy Long to draw pleadings that will look to Judge Seawell as though they came out of a law-office. As the tax-payers have seen fit to give the handsome and popular Mr. Long the job of attending to all their important litigation perhaps they ought to insist that he try his cases before Judge Dunne, and thus insure harmony between the intellect of the bench and the intellect of the bar. Much better would it be of course to match the intellect of the city's attorney with the average intellect of counsel for public service corporations, but the tax-payers evidently are conscious of their own inability to achieve such a triumph, for otherwise they would double the salary of the office. But knowing that they are always likely to prefer good fellows to good lawyers they have made certain that at least they will not waste money on the kind of talent they are sure to get.

Mutiny and Revolution

Brazil is said to have established a very mischievous precedent, one that all nations must deplore, when it vouchsafed amnesty to the mutineers of the navy by whom the government was blackmailed. This is not a correct conception of the matter. No precedent was established in Brazil. The Government merely followed a precedent that was established centuries ago. There was a time in Latin countries when episodes similar to that which occurred in Brazil were of common occurrence. In the reign of Philip II the Spanish army usually mutinied after a victory on the field of battle, and never failed to get what it demanded including amnesty. History teaches that armies and navies are always a source of danger to the nations that support them. They have been employed for revolutionary purposes quite as often as for foreign conquest. If we reflect on the matter we shall see that what occurred in Brazil was not vastly different from what recently occurred in Portugal. The only difference is that the Portuguese naval men demanded a new form of government for all the people while those of Brazil demanded new government only on shipboard. And in Portugal since the revolution the rebels of the navy and army have demanded a pension for life from the new Government, and we are told that it has been deemed advisable to grant that demand. So it appears that their treachery to the king was inspired by the same self-motive that actuated the mutineers of Brazil.

Justice to Ruef

When the Court of Appeal upholds a verdict of guilty in a criminal case it does not mean that the spirit of American justice presided at the trial. It means merely that the record fails to disclose any violation of the defendant's substantial rights; in other words that so far as the record goes there is nothing to show that the defendant's conviction was procured by any obvious pretitution of the machinery of justice. But of course the record used on appeal does not mirror the proceedings of the trial court. It deals only with such things as can be preserved in the hieroglyphics of the official stenographer. The atmosphere of a courtroom is not to be visualized, or imaged, or rendered cognizable through such media. Only the best counsel for the defendant are afforded counsel for the defendant. Consequently the inquiry of the appellate judges is confined absolutely to what is tangible, and that is sometimes of the least importance. A man may be tried in strict accordance with the specific rules by which legal justice is administered and yet be deprived of the safeguards contemplated by the fundamental principles of justice. The truth is that these principles may be violated only without remedy to the defendant by the officers charged with the enforcement. By his manner a judge may influence a jury; by doing less than his duty a prosecuting attorney may do more than the law allows. These reflections have been induced by that decision of the Court of Appeal which brought a melancholy prospect to Abe Ruef on the eve of a national holiday. Believing though we are that Ruef is about to get his deserts, moral justice is to be administered to him at the hands of the constituted authorities; nevertheless we do not feel that the summation is rightly to be regarded as a triumph of our system of jurisprudence. Ruef of course is guilty of many felonies. He has admitted his guilt. To send him to the penitentiary is to mete out to him what he deserves in the way of moral justice; but how unfortunate it is that he is not tried in strict accordance with the orderly processes of the law! For what can it avail us to make an example of one who has violated the law if in accomplishing that purpose we outrage the spirit of the law? The first duty that we owe to ourselves is reverence for the law, and we are never fatally delinquent as when we countenance anything that savors of a travesty of justice. Now as to the trial of Abe Ruef we may well question the propriety of the whole proceeding. Even a guilty man has the right to be tried by an impartial jury, and it is certainly a matter of grave doubt whether this right was accorded Abe Ruef.

I was tried by a judge who, whether intentionally or not, became a party to the intrigues of the men behind the prosecution. Whether justly or not this judge became involved in the scandals that were brought upon those men, and as a consequence their interests became his interests. It became as important for him as for them that the methods of the graft prosecution should receive some kind of vindication, and the conviction of Abe Ruef was one of the things essential to their welfare. Now obviously, in such circumstances a judge must be more than human to preserve an attitude of absolute impartiality. Perhaps the judge by whom Abe Ruef was tried did all in his power to abate his prejudices, but the fact remains that the trial was of an extraordinary character, made notable by features unprecedented, unique. Many adroit aids to the prosecution were employed in that trial. The bodyguards of attorneys became functionaries of the court. The presumption of guilt and the indignation of the self-righteous were incarnated in a body of women by whom atmosphere was contributed to the proceedings for the wholesome effect that it might have on the jurors in whose ears the murmurs of the mob in the street incessantly sounded. The tribunal of justice bore the aspect of a cheap theater in which the feelings of the audience are harrowed by the ranting actors in a sensational melodrama. In the midst of the trial an infuriated man who had been goaded into madness by the tauntings of an officer of the court attempted to assassinate his tormentor; and then mass-meetings were harangued by representatives of the municipal government intent upon increasing the volume of public clamor. And finally in the midst of scenes that must have given the jury the impression that the whole community was wrought up to a high pitch of indignation, one of the attorneys for the people addressing the defendant's peers ordered them in a voice of thunder to render anything but a verdict of guilty. Such was the character of the trial that Judge Lawlor gave Abe Ruef—not in Russia, but in San Francisco. It was a trial in accordance with the forms of law and therein is the tragedy of it. If Ruef had been tried by Judge Lynch we should have less reason to lament the moral effect; for Judge Lynch presides above the forms of the law. Judge Lynch is frankly lawless. As a result of trying Abe Ruef rather in accordance with legal formula than in accordance with extrajudicial methods we have somewhat diminished the majesty of justice; and that is worse than bribing a supervisor. To society justice is of more importance than all else, and though we cannot administer it perfectly we can at least refrain from law-loring it.

The Immunity Contract

We are told that the conviction of Abe Ruef proves that the graft prosecution was not in vain. But this assertion is somewhat misleading. Its tendency is to convey the impression that the crime of which Ruef stands convicted is the crime for which he was prosecuted. Also its tendency is to cause us to lose sight of the fact that in the moral philosophy of the gentlemen whom we entrusted with the task of regenerating the city the crimes of our unspeakable grafter were nothing more than inconsequential manifestations of an erring spirit. As a matter of fact Ruef was not prosecuted for corrupting our municipal government. It will be remembered that Mr. Rudolph Spreckels in his first interview with "Big Jim" Gallagher in the Presidio described Ruef's crimes euphemistically as "venial sins." It is a matter of court record that Mr. Spreckels, even at that early date, had ceased to look on Ruef with abhorrence. In those days the whole community was eager for the punishment of the man who had debauched the city, and the whole community believed that Mr. Spreckels and his confreres were similarly minded, but those gentlemen had other fish to fry. It will be remembered that while still affecting to be determined to punish Ruef they entered into an immunity contract with him, by the terms of which they agreed to dismiss all but one of the indictments against him, the one in which he was charged with having blackmailed the French restaurant keepers. It will also be remembered that they entered into a verbal agreement on the side, which was ratified at a memorable midnight meeting and witnessed by two clergymen, by the terms of which they agreed to dismiss the charge of blackmail. The written agreement was designed to mislead in the event of the deal being made public prematurely. For the prosecutors were always fearful of public sentiment, and they realized that much time was needed for its cultivation. And so while their plan was to set Ruef free as soon as they procured the conviction of the higher-ups they were afraid to take the public into their confidence. This plan was disarranged when the Supreme Court decided that the indictments for blackmail were invalid. Shortly thereafter the story of the immunity contracts leaked out, and public indignation caused alarm in the prosecution camp. Thereupon the prosecutors disavowed the verbal agreement, and said it had always been their intention to have Ruef sentenced on at least one charge, and that the charge of blackmail to which he had pleaded guilty, but which had been wiped out by the Supreme Court, was the one. The improbability of this statement, however, appears from the circumstance that while Ruef had pleaded guilty to the charge of blackmail immediately after making the midnight deal, Judge Dunne postponed the sentencing of him from time to time for nearly a year. If it had been agreed that he should go to the penitentiary why should not the sentence have been promptly imposed, and the defendant have the benefit of the time that was running? Surely Ruef would not have been willing to remain in jail for nearly a year if he was not serving out the time that eventually he would have to serve. The only plausible explanation of the whole matter is that public sentiment affrighted the prosecutors, and probably there is much truth in Ruef's statement that about the time of the Supreme Court's decision his confession was found to be somewhat insufficient for the purposes of the prosecution. At any rate there was no zeal for the punishment of Ruef among the prosecutors until the story of immunity leaked out. Nor by reason of his crimes had his personality become in the slightest degree repugnant to our civic patriots. On the contrary he seemed to appeal strongly to their charity and compassion. To prepare the public mind for the news of the immunity bath they described him as a penitent sinner, one who had been subjected to strong temptation. For more than a year they permitted the public to believe that his confession was impelled by remorse and repentance. Whether for complete or for part immunity he had made with them a cold-blooded bargain for his freedom, and they knew that repentance was something foreign to his nature; yet they sought to conciliate public opinion in his behalf that they might escape just censure for making light of the crimes of the man who had debauched the city government. So whatever became their feeling toward him after they had ceased their amiable, social intercourse with him in his sumptuous private prison, we may be sure it was not inspired with the repugnance that crimes such as he had committed excite in persons of refined sensibilities. So also we may be reasonably certain that the crime for which Judge Lawlor conceives fourteen years to be fit punishment is not the crime stated in the indictment. Judge Lawlor, it will be remembered, was one of the principal actors at the midnight meeting.

Perspective Impressions

Has somebody put the lid on T. R.? Or is it the calm that presages a storm? The suspense is awful.

Now it appears that Mr. Hearst objects only to such fight pictures as are not exhibited in the Examiner.

Nobody begrudges the Mission a carnival; but we have learned that there are many people who object to the Mission's appetite for park funds.

No inaugural parade! No colonels to dazzle and ravish the multitude! Every lover of the beautiful in the fair State of California must explore the iconoclasm of democratic simplicity.

It's funny now that we are to have a reform administration of affairs that there should be so much talk of the advisability of raising the bonds of State officials.

This is the season of the year when the instinct of self preservation is overcome by a taste for mushrooms.

The Three Cherry Trees

Grew in a garden all shady,
And there for delight

With a golden glow
Shed a warm, beautiful light—
A lover's glow, a lover's light.

But she walking there
Was so far from him,
Lovelier than all else within it,
Blissful yet lonely and sweet.

And one long summer's day
Charmed that lady away,
With vows sweet and merry and tender,
A lover with voice low and tender.

Moss and lichen those green branches deck,
Weeds nod in its paths green and shady:
Still to haunt there in dreams—
The ghost of that beautiful lady,
That happy and beautiful lady.

—Walter de la Mare.

Little Talks on Death

By Lord Dunsany

I
Death and the Orange

Two dark young men in a foreign western land sat at a restaurant table with one woman. And on the woman's plate was a small orange which had an evil laughter in its heart.

And both of the men would be looking at the woman all the time, and they ate little and they drank much.

And the woman was smiling equally at each.

Then the small orange that had the laughter in its heart rolled slowly off the plate on to the floor. And the dark young men both sought for it at once, and they met suddenly beneath the table, and soon they were speaking swift words to one another, and a horror and an impotence came over the Reason of each as she sat helpless at the back of the mind, and the heart of the orange laughed and the woman went on smiling; and Death, who was sitting at another table tete-a-tete with an old man, rose and came over to listen to the quarrel.

II
Death and Odysseus

In the Olympian courts Love laughed at Death, because he was unsightly, and because She couldn't help it, and because he never did anything worth doing, and because She would.

And Death hated being laughed at. And he used to brood apart, thinking only of his wrongs and of what he could do to end this intolerable treatment.

But one day Death appeared in the courts with an air, and They all noticed it.

"What are you up to now?" said Love.

And Death with some solemnity said to Her: "I am going to frighten Odysseus"; and, drawing about him his grey traveler's cloak, went out through the windy door with his jowl turned earthward.

And he came soon to Ithaca and the hall that Athene knew, and opened the door and saw there famous Odysseus, with his white locks, bending close over the fire, trying to warm his hands.

And the wind from the open door blew bitterly on Odysseus.

And Death came up behind him, and suddenly vanished.

And Odysseus went on warming his pale hands.

Then Death came close and began to mouth at him.

And after a while Odysseus turned and spoke. "Well, old servant," he said, "have your masters been kind to you since I made you work for me round Ilium?"

And Death for some while stood mute, for he thought of the laughter of Love.

Then "Come now," said Odysseus, "lend me your shoulder;" and, he leaning heavily on that bony joint, they went together through the open door.

III

The Guest

A young man came into an ornate restaurant at eight o'clock in London.

He was alone, but two places had been laid at the table which was reserved for him.

He had chosen the dinner very carefully, by letter a week before.

A waiter asked about the other guest. "You probably won't see him till the coffee comes," the young man told him; so he was served alone.

Those at adjacent tables might have noticed the young man continually addressing the empty chair and carrying on a monologue with it throughout his elaborate dinner.

"I think you knew my father," he said to it over the soup.

"I sent for you this evening," he continued, "because I want you to do me a good turn; in fact I must insist on it."

There was nothing eccentric about the man except for this habit of addressing an empty chair; certainly he was eating as good a dinner as any sane man could wish for.

After the Burgundy had been served he became more voluble in his monologue, not that he spoiled his wine by drinking excessively.

"We have several acquaintances in common," he said. "I met King Seti a year ago in Thebes. I should think he has altered very little since you knew him. I thought his forehead a little low for a king's. Cheops has left the house that he built for your reception; he must have prepared for you for years and years; I suppose you have seldom been entertained like that."

"I ordered this dinner over a week ago. I thought then that a lady might have come with me, but as she wouldn't I've asked you. She may not after all be as lovely as Helen of Troy. Was Helen very lovely? Not when you knew her perhaps. You were lucky in Cleopatra; you must have known her when she was in her prime. You never knew the mermaids nor the fairies nor the lovely goddesses of long ago—that's where we have the best of you."

He was silent when the waiters came to his table, but rambled merrily on as soon as he left, still turned to the empty chair.

"You know I saw you here in London only the other day. You were on a motor-bus going down Ludgate Hill. It was going much too fast for London is a good place. But I shall be long enough to leave it. It was in London I met the lady that I was speaking about. If it hadn't been for London I probably shouldn't have known her, and if it hadn't been for London she probably wouldn't have had so much besides to amuse her. It cuts both ways."

He paused once to order coffee, going earnestly at the waiter and putting a sovereign into his hand. "Don't let it be chicory," he said.

The waiter brought the coffee, and the young man dropped a tabloid of some sort into his cup.

"I don't suppose you come here very often," he went on. "Well, you probably want to be going. I haven't taken you much out of my way; there is plenty for you to do in London."

Then having drunk his coffee he fell on to the floor by a foot of the empty chair; and a waiter who was dining in the room bent over him and announced to the anxious manager the visible presence of the young man's guest.

Hearst and the Fight Pictures

Editor Town Talk—Dear Sir: If you are able to decide a wager that I have made I hope that you will do so. I have bet a friend of mine in the Family Club that Mr. Hearst has ordered the discharge of his whole staff of San Francisco editors. I must confess that I have no information whatever on this subject. The fact is I took chance because of my faith in the sincerity of the greatest of American journalists and most unflinching of American reformers. I feel certain that as soon as Mr. Hearst learned that the Examiner violated the Sabbath by publishing pictures of height that ended in the defeat of the "Durable Day," he fell into a paroxysm of indignation. It was more natural than to suppose that as soon as he came out of his fit he discharged the men responsible for the humiliating stultification of his great newspaper. Mr. Hearst is nothing if inconsistent; hardly anything if he is not sincere, and we all know that he has inveighed with his might against vulgar and demoralizing pictures of pugilistic encounters. We know furthermore that he regards fight pictures as indecent, and that for tolerating them he has held helpless public officials up to execration. It was Mr. Hearst who organized the crusade against fight pictures, and that crusade was in its infancy less than six months ago. At that time he was calling on the mothers of the country to rise up and demand the inhibition of fight pictures. He was exhorting the clergymen, too, and the clergymen as usual responded, and had their own pictures published by way of reward for their improvised enthusiasm. Mr. Hearst in those days created the impression that his zeal for his beloved public was at a white heat. Never had he been more vociferous; never had anything scandalized him half so bad as the fight pictures. Hence it was that when I opened my Sunday Examiner and found a large picture of the fight the day before I knew positively that something would drop in the Examiner office. I announced at the club that such would be the case, and a sporting member immediately sneered, thus making me so angry that when he offered to bet I took him up though betting is contrary to my principles. And now I feel that perhaps I was betting on a sure thing because of course there is a standing order in the Examiner office that makes fight pictures tabu. Why, to believe that Mr. Hearst conducted that crusade against fight pictures just to trifle with the public is to believe that he is really serious about nothing; not even about politics or good government; that his only policy is to keep the people on edge. Of course that's incredible.

The Assassins of Character

Editor Town Talk: I notice that the Bulletin treats with derision Mayor McCarthy's letter to the grand jury asking that certain calumnies against him be investigated. Perhaps it will occur to you, inasmuch as you are evidently well acquainted with that journal and its ways, that it might have been expected that the Bulletin would not take seriously an effort to discourage slander. One who deals in poisoned arrows is not likely to frown upon that kind of industry. In my opinion Mayor McCarthy should be applauded for what he has done. If there is one thing from which this city suffers more than anything else it is the pernicious practice of back-biting and knocking. Our worst enemies are the hawkers of malicious rumors and purveyors of mean and injurious gossip. They are as inimical to the welfare of a community as thieves and murderers. They should be exposed and driven to cover. We have learned from what occurred at St. Louis last week that New Orleans is making good use of the reports that our government is in corrupt hands. Whence such reports emanate it is not hard to conjecture. When Mr. Rudolph Spreckels addressed a meeting in Chicago a few weeks ago he said that our government had not improved. Mr. Spreckels and the men with whom he is associated will never be convinced that our government is pure while it is not in their hands.

Yours, etc.,

Being a Brief Chronicle of Significant Events the Wide World Over.

Writing in the Provinces

There are strong indications that the provincial press has caught the contagion of fine writing which rages in this city. San Jose has just had a gem and at least one of the scribes has risen to the occasion. Listen to this which I have culled from the columns of the San Jose Times: "A gorgeous, glittering stream of bejeweled and decked society, representatives of elite San Jose, poured in at the doors of the Auditorium for several hours last evening. About each booth was gathered a throng, charmed into liberal generosity by the enchanting Circean voice of fellow-writing and beneficence. Into these little whirlpools the constant drain of dollars swirled and eddied, gaining momentum always—a monumental evidence that the 'milk of human kindness' is still oozing warmly through the veins of San Jose's citizens."

To vindicate its title to the possession of blue blood "elite San Jose" must show that this milk is thin and cerulean.

The World's Unknown Lands

The reports that Canadian Government explorers have discovered in the northwestern part of that country a mountain that is said to be the highest on the continent and a lake of some 10,000 square miles in extent that had hitherto been unknown to the white man, are reminders of explorers' work that yet remains to be done. The mountain near the Porcupine River is said to surpass Mount McKinley's 20,480 feet by nearly 100 feet; the lake, lying in a great virgin tract in which no one seems to have entered before, is said to be 150 miles wide and more than 350 miles long. Such discoveries reveal how much of the earth's surface remains to be dealt with by the explorer and the surveyor. Scarcely one-sixth of the land area of the globe has been subject to reliable survey work. The upper valley of the Amazon, the northern part of Australia, the interior of Asia, Arabia and New Guinea are almost unknown. The maps of Albania, parts of Spain, Turkey and Russia are mere hypothetical sketches based upon no exact surveys. The common belief that the Arctic and Antarctic polar regions are alone unconquered seems far from the truth. Every civilized nation has a terra incognita nearer home.

The Local Option Plan

An insight into the sort of bill which the Anti-Saloon League will present to the next Legislature is given by the Sacramento Bee in the following comment on the result of the election in Oregon:

"In the recent election State-wide prohibition was defeated in Oregon by a majority of about 10,000 votes. The proposal was of a most drastic sort, forbidding the possession or giving away of intoxicants, as well as their manufacture and sale. At the same election local option was changed so as to make the town or city the unit instead of the county. In other words, each municipality will decide the liquor question for itself, free from control of the county. This result is of interest to California, as a local option measure is to be presented to the California Legislature by the Anti-Saloon League. But this measure will be so framed as not to give counties control over cities and towns. It will leave municipalities to decide for themselves, while authorizing the voters of any county, outside of its towns and cities, to make the county wet or dry, as the majority may prefer."

The Bee states very justly that unless there be either absolute prohibition or absolute freedom of the liquor traffic, regulation becomes a matter of expediency rather than of principle.

Who Controls the Buffaloes?

Quite a delicate international problem has been offered for the solution of the United States and Canada. It concerns a herd of buffaloes located in Montana. These buffaloes are the descendants of calves captured in 1877 by a half breed Indian on the plains of Montana. The half breed sold a lot of them to the Dominion for $250 a head, but the bison have not yet reached their destination and a party of royal Canadian hunters started out to kill a lot of them in Montana recently.

The Attorney General of the State declared that to kill these animals who are wild would be a violation of the game laws and the Canadian government was forced to cancel the permission for the hunting trip. But the vexed question as to which government controls the herd still remains to be solved.

Seals in the Pribylofs

Because of the reckless slaughter of seals in the Pribylof Islands by Japanese, these islands may be declared government reservations, accessible only to Federal officials, as the only method of preventing the Japanese from securing supplies for their sealing fleets, which this season got away with 5,000 sealskins, valued at $40 each. This plan is the outcome of investigation by the cutter seal patrol service maintained the past season, in which forty-nine Japanese were arrested on the charge of poaching. Officers of the service declare that the slaughter of the seal herds goes on unabated, and that the diminution, which even among hundreds of animals has become perceptible, spells positive extermination within a few years. The hand of the alien fisherman strikes at the root of the industry, for it kills the helpless female while she swims far beyond the three-mile limits for food for the family. No American vessel under the present treaty can fish within sixty miles of the islands, while the Japanese are allowed to go up to the three-mile limit. The United States government this year killed 12,000 seals, but they were males and caused no permanent damage to the herds.

World's Greatest Oil War

While the ordinary person hears little of the strife, the world is just now in the throes of a great war. It is a war of the oil interests of Europe, America and Asia. The Financial News of London thus describes it:

"Without exaggeration it may be stated that the silent war now being waged in the oil industry is the biggest oil war that has ever broken out. It is the biggest not only in respect to the amount of capital engaged in it, but on account of the enormous area covered by the operation. The Standard Oil Company of America is engaged in declared commercial warfare in Great Britain, France, Germany, Roumania, Austria, Italy, Mexico; and in most of the countries mentioned it comes into direct or indirect opposition with the Royal Dutch-Shell combine. It may be added, also, that in most countries the opponents of the Standard Oil Company are supported by the government. Broadly, it may be stated that there is room for the Standard Oil Company in all the European countries mentioned; but the Royal Dutch-Shell people are determined to strengthen their hold on European trade, and, naturally, the Standard Oil Company is determined to fight every inch of the ground for the present. Presumably the only basis of agreement between the two powers will be the parcelling up of European sections, in which one or the other organization will trade practically exclusively, or a general agreement as to prices. On these premises may reasonably be questioned whether the end of the fight is soon or near, after all."

Prayer

By Leo Tolstoi (Translated by V. Tchertkoff)

Your Father knoweth what things ye have need of, before ye ask him.—Matt. vi. 8.
"No, no and no! It cannot be * * * Doctor! Can't you really do anything? Why are you all silent?"

Thus spoke a young mother coming out with sharp resolute steps from the nursery where her three-year-old boy—her first and only one—was dying from water on the brain.

Her husband and the doctor, who had been talking with lowered voice, became silent. The husband timidly approached her, tenderly touched her dishevelled head with his hand and gave a deep sigh. The doctor stood with bent head, indicating by his silence and stillness the hopelessness of the case.

"It can't be helped," said the husband—"it can't be helped, dear. * * *"

"Oh, don't say that, don't say that!" she rebukingly exclaimed, as if resentfully, and quickly turned and went back to the nursery.

The husband wished to detain her.

"Katie! Don't go * * *"

Without answering she glanced at him with her big tired eyes, and entered the nursery.

The boy was lying on the nurse's arm with a white pillow put under his head. His eyes were open, but he was not looking with them. From his compressed little mouth there bubbled foam. The nurse with a severe solemn countenance was gazing somewhere beyond his face and did not move when the mother entered. When the mother came quite close to her and slipped her hand under the pillow, to take the child, the nurse softly said: "He is passing!" and turned away from the mother. But the mother did not heed her, and with a deft accustomed movement, took the child into her arms. The boy's long curly hair became entangled. She put it straight and looked into his face.

"No, I cannot," she whispered, and with a quick but careful movement, returned him to the nurse and went out of the room.

It was the second week the child was ailing. Throughout the whole illness the mother several times a day had passed from despair to hope. During all this time she had hardly slept an hour and a half a day. All this while, several times a day, she repeatedly retired into her bedroom, placed herself in front of the big ikon of the Saviour in its gold setting, and prayed God to save her boy. The dark-faced Saviour held in his dark little hand a gilded book on which was written in black: "Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Standing before this ikon, she used to pray, putting all the power of her soul into her prayer, and although in the depth of her being, even during her prayer, she felt she would not move the mountain, and that God would act not according to her, but according to Himself, she still prayed, recited the usual prayers and her own she improvised and expressed aloud with especial fervour.

Now that she understood the child had died, she felt that something had happened in her head—as if something had detached itself and was whirling round and round, and upon entering her bedroom she looked around at her things with astonishment, as if she did not recognise the place. Then she lay down on the bed, falling with her head not on the pillow, but on her husband's folded dressing-gown, and she lost consciousness.

And lo! in her sleep she sees her Kostia, strong and merry, with his curly hair and little thin white neck, sitting on his small armchair, dangling his tiny legs with their fat calves, and with pouting lips, carefully seating his doll of a boy on a cardboard horse with one leg amissing, and a hole in its back.

"How well it is that he is alive," she thinks, "and how cruel that he died. Why should he? Could God to whom I prayed so much allow him to die? Of what use is this to God? Was he in anyone's way? Does not God know that all my life is in him and that I cannot live without him? And suddenly to take and torment this poor dear innocent being and shatter my life, and to answer all my supplications by letting his eyes become fixed, his body outstretched cold and stiff." And again she sees him. He draws near. Such a little creature passing through such a high door, swinging his arms like grown-up people. And he looks and smiles. * * * "The darling! And he it is that God wished to torment and kill! Why then pray to Him if he can commit such horrors?"

And suddenly Matryosha, the nurse's young helper, begins to say something very strange. The mother knows it is Matryosha and yet it is at the same time both Matryosha and an angel. "But if she is an angel, why has she no wings on her back?" thinks the mother. However, she recalls to mind that someone—she does not remember who, but someone trustworthy—told her that now sometimes angels are with wings. And the angel Matryosha says: "You are wrong, ma'am, to be offended with God. He can't possibly listen to everyone. People often ask such things that if they were granted to another must be hurt. Now at this moment all over Russia prayers are being uttered, and by what sort of men? The greatest bishops, monks in cathedrals, in churches over the relics of saints—all are praying that God should grant victory over the Japanese. But can this be right? One should not pray for this, besides He cannot satisfy everyone. The Japanese are praying that they should conquer. But He, Father, is only one. What is He to do? What is He to do, ma'am?" says Matryosha.

"Yes, this is so. It is the old story. Even the tsar said the same. All know this and all say it. I am not speaking of this. But why can't He grant a request when I ask not for something harmful, but only that my dear boy should not be allowed to die. I cannot live without him," said the mother, and she feels him embrace her.

Brown of Oakland

King no heed of the storm clouds that were gathering the Rev. C. R. Brown of Oakland's First Congregational Church has suffered the consequences of his indiscreet indifference. The thunders have rolled over his head, and the lightning has searched for him not in vain. There has been too much ceremony between the clergyman's resignation and his going. If he had stayed for the old homestead in Iowa when first I learned him that rumor was on the wing the raucous voice of the meddlesome dame might never have reached the eager ears of the daily press. Dr. Brown is paying the penalty of his own self-complacency. The public has been vouchsafed glimpses of the truth. The whole truth may never come out, but enough has been said to make it clear that Dr. Brown has been involved in difficulties about which he does not care to take the public into his confidence. To his conduct is attributed much unpleasant gossip relating to Mrs. George H. Martin, an estimable woman, the wife of a prominent physician, and by her he is publicly proclaimed a coward. This ought to be enough to make any man feel uncomfortable. How it makes a distinguished clergyman feel, a pulpiteer who has posed as a social reformer, and who has lashed sinners with much zeal, and passed harsh judgment on his neighbors, it is not difficult to conjecture.

Inaccuracy Born of Nervousness

In an interview with an Examiner reporter Dr. Brown said, "There is absolutely nothing in all this." Perhaps such gross inaccuracy of statement should be attributed to Dr. Brown's nervous condition. The fact is there is a lot in it; much more than has been published at this writing; much more, I hope, than any of the papers will publish. For it is very unfortunate that anything in the nature of a scandal that has disturbed church circles should be made the subject of newspaper discussion. And yet enough should be said to make it clearly understood that Mrs. Martin has suffered injustice for which the pastor of the First Congregational Church is responsible. Dr. Brown does not improve matters by his reticence or by any such equivocal statement as his which he wrote to the Examiner: "You ask about Dr. and Mrs. Martin. They are both good friends." Does Dr. Brown mean that they are both good friends of his? It would seem so, but he certainly knows they are not. They are good friends of each other, but not of Dr. Brown. It is incredible that Mr. Martin who says that Dr. Brown is a coward is his friend. And as for her husband, he has defended Dr. Brown, but it does not follow necessarily that he now holds Dr. Brown in high esteem.

The Whitewashing of Brown

Since the writing of the foregoing paragraphs meeting of the trustees of the First Congregational Church has been held, and Dr. Brown has been given a clean bill of health by such eminent citizens as Warren Olney Jr., C. Z. Merritt, W. C. Barnard and A. S. Carmen. By them the jealous pastor was given a fine coat of white-wash and begged to remain and labor for the salvation of the sinners of Oakland. These dis-naturally fermented in the bottle are the Main-Swiss Colony's ASTI SPECIAL, SEC (white) and ASTI ROUGE (Sparkling Burgundy).

tinguished gentlemen, I am loth to observe, acted, to say the least, imprudently. They were too eager to vindicate Dr. Brown. They were called upon by Dr. Brown to investigate him, but instead of conducting an inquiry they merely listened to what he had to say and then exonerated him with a loud blast of encomiums accompanied by shrill denunciation of everybody by whom his conduct had been impugned. I wonder what these pious churchmen would say if a public official to whom the finger of scorn was pointing were whitewashed with similar precipitancy and despatch? Let us ponder the asininity of their behaviour. First, they permitted Dr. Brown to cloud the issue by affecting to believe that it had been rumored that he had been asked to resign from his pastorate. Now it is well known that Dr. Brown was negotiating for a call to other parts long before he took the trustees into his confidence; and as I intimated weeks ago his eagerness to get away was due to the storm that he could plainly discern in the offing. For Dr. Brown has been uncomfortable many months. Secondly, the trustees characterized the gossip about Dr. Brown as vicious without perceiving that in doing so they reflected on Mrs. Brown. It has been clearly stated that Dr. Brown's wife was responsible for the gossip, she having insulted Mrs. Martin in the vestibule of the First Congregational Church. Dr. Brown announced at the meeting that his wife was ready to look the trustees in the eye and tell them that nothing had come between them in their married life. But the trustees had no desire to be looked in the eye by Mrs. Brown, or even to interrogate her. They were satisfied with Mrs. Brown's letter in which she admitted that she had misjudged Mrs. Martin. But how she came to misjudge Mrs. Martin they did not inquire. Even Mr. Olney who is an attorney, and not slow himself to judge people, did not have the acumen to draw any inference from this letter. It did not occur to him that possibly in misjudging Mrs. Martin, Mrs. Brown had previously passed some kind of judgment on her husband. But evidently the trustees were not hungry for inferences. They were too busy with the whitewash brush. And perhaps most of them felt as did the good Mr. Merritt—that Dr. Brown is as pure as the Angel Gabriel. So Dr. Brown came out of the meeting with flying colors; but the reaction must have been terrible.

"What you want to do is to have that mud hole in the road fixed," said the visitor.

"That goes to show," replied Farmer Corn-tassel, "how little you reformers understand local conditions. I've purty nigh paid off a mortgage with the money I made haulin' automobiles out o' that mud hole."

The Defects of the Bohemian Club

I asked a member of the Bohemian Club how he liked the new roost of the owl and he threw up his hands in mock dismay. He said that he had never been so disappointed in his life as when he first inspected the brick building in Post street. And then he began to explain. The Taylor street windows, he said, the windows which have a western exposure and get the sun, with three exceptions open into stairways, coat-rooms and lavatories. Only three of them open into the club rooms proper and these light the library which would have been just as well off if it had nothern windows. He said that the lobby had already become the favorite lounging place of the club members, a situation which was not foreseen when the plans were laid out. With this lobby full of members and the bar right opposite it, the private life of the club is exposed to a stranger as soon as he enters the door. This lobby, by the way, has a skylight but no windows. My informant went on to say that the sunniest windows on the Post street side lit the billiard room. "Nobody wants to look out of the windows of a billiard room," he said; "and that might just as well have been the lounging room." He said that you had to go downstairs to the dining room and upstairs to the jinks room. He called attention to the fact that on the opening night the dining room proved too small to accommodate the members, so that a great many had to be served in the red room where they couldn't possibly hear the toasts. He said that the jinks room was hard to reach on account of the awkward stairway leading up to it and he pointed out that as jinks are given only once or twice a year, the room devoted to the purpose is lost space for the greater part of the twelve-month. It would have been much better, he thought, to put the jinks room on the main floor where it could have been used for big dinners, etc.

"Why didn't you stay to ascertain how badly the man was injured?" demanded the judge.

"Why," explained the chauffeur, "I knew I could find out from the daily papers."

The Result of Compromise

I can well understand how the Bohemian Club came to be built in so unsatisfactory a manner. There was a building committee of five members consisting of James McNab, chairman; Frederick W. Hall, William Letts Oliver, Raphael Weill and Frank P. McLennon. In such a committee there were bound to be disagreements and the plans finally adopted represented, I suppose, a compromise. This is of course no reflection on the committee which consists of men of taste and experience; it is in the nature of such a body to differ and where there are differences some must give way or nothing will be accomplished. Then again, the club changed its architect in the middle of the work. Loring Rixford, the original architect, was appointed City Architect after he had started work on the building and was compelled to relinquish it. Then George W. Kelham took charge. The old adage about swapping horses in the middle of the stream applies to this situation. I believe that the club spent about $330,000 on the building alone. The Pacific-Union is spending about $380,000 with immeasurably superior results. But of course the Pacific-Union had the framework of the old brown-stone Flood mansion to begin with.

The Rumor about the Mayor

That was a curious rumor which went floating about town breathing aspersions against the integrity of Mayor McCarthy. It was impalpable, elusive, coming no one knew whence. As nearly as I can make out it seems to have started in the commission district or on one of the exchanges, but it was too airy a mystery to be pinned to any particular authority. It quickly penetrated to the newspaper offices, but no notice was taken of it till the mayor bodied it forth in a letter to the grand jury. The story varied with different tellers. Some said that the mayor was going to resign, others that he was to be recalled. One story even named Fred Sanborn of the Oliver Grand Jury as the Bulletin's choice to succeed him. Who started these stories and for what purpose were they put in circulation? 'Tis a mystery too deep for my plummet to sound.

Why Englebright Was Beaten

When friends fall out over politics there is usually the devil to pay. Those who delve into the arcana of politics say that Congressman Englebright of the first district bitterly bemoans the day that he forfeited the good will of his old pal Charlie Clinch of Grass Valley. Clinch is one of the most popular men in Nevada County. He used to be a member of the executive committee of the Republican State Central Committee and is now on the Board of Prison Directors. When Englebright decided that he would give up mining engineering around Nevada City and try for a seat in Congress, his friend Clinch went to the Santa Cruz convention, although he was not a delegate, and assisted in securing him his first nomination. That cemented their friendly relations. The families were very close and last winter Clinch's daughter went to Washington and spent several months as the guest of the Englebrights. But after the primary election in August there came a misunderstanding. Clinch's son Raymond was anxious to have a taste of practical politics and his friends got him into the contest for secretary of the Nevada county central committee. Young Clinch was aligned with the regulars and was opposed by the insurgents, the fight becoming very bitter. Congressman Englebright, it seems, promised the young man his personal assistance, but, it is said, when he discovered that the factional differences would injure his own candidacy, he changed his mind and treated young Raymond Clinch in a manner unnecessarily curt. The split between the two old friends followed as a matter of course. Some say that Clinch worked against Englebright among the mine owners, but he denies this, declaring that he merely announced that he was going to vote for Judge Raker, the democratic candidate, without attempting to influence anybody's vote. Be that as it may, the fact that Clinch was not in his fight injured Englebright enormously. Judge Raker overturned a big Republican plurality and beat him.

Trouble Over the Inaugural Ball

Up in Sacramento there was a lot of trouble brewing over the inaugural ball even before Governor-elect Johnson announced that he was too unostentatious to think of attending. Mayor Beard with two or three others appointed a big committee to take charge of the arrangements, the idea being to make the ball this year the most brilliant ever given. But there were a lot of prominent Republicans of Sacramento left off that committee; hence the howl that is going up. Although there are one hundred and thirty members of the committee, including a number of democrats who naturally did nothing for the governor-elect during his campaign, not a single member of the Sacramento county central committee was deemed worthy of a place. It is being flatly asserted that the omission of these men from the inaugural committee was intentional and that it was done at the instance of certain Lincoln-Roosevelt League politicians in the capital. Men who worked hard for Johnson want to know why Albert Elkus, a good campaign contributor, was ignored and why Chairman Haub of the county committee and Johnny Ing and Emil Steinman and others who took off their coats for Johnson were not asked to assist in making the assembly of the "beauty and the chivalry" of the State a success. Are the regulars to be overlooked, even in the gayeties of the coming administration?

The Bonds of State Officials

One piece of legislation which will be attempted at the coming session of our lawmakers will be an increase in the amount of the bonds required of certain state officials. It is being pointed out that the bonds were fixed many years ago when the state's business was much smaller than at present and that they are now wholly inadequate to protect the state against possible losses through maladministration. The Secretary of State has a bond of $10,000. That amount was fixed when the office handled about $25,000 a year; but today the Secretary of State collects about a million a year from the various sources of revenue which are controlled by his office. The State Printer expends between $300,000 and $400,000 a year to furnish school books and the same amount in books is passed to the Superintendent of Public Instruction; yet they too are bonded for only $10,000. The State Controller handles no money and puts up a bond of $50,000, while the State Treasurer who handles millions yearly, is bonded for only $100,000. The Attorney-General handles no money, but his bond is $10,000. The Clerk of the Supreme Court handles comparatively little money, but is bonded in the same amount. It is apparent that the bonds should be equalized in such a way as to protect the state in accordance with its present enormous volume of business. There will be a roar from the office holders, of course, when any attempt to raise their bonds is made, but it is very likely that this will be done just the same.

"I believe in calling a spade a spade," said the emphatic person.

"That's right, friend," replied Bronco Bol. "There was a man who nearly lost his life here by gettin' into a game an' tryin' to call a spade a club."

The Boomers of the Mission

At the suggestion of Father D. O. Crowley the Mission Promotion Association has pledged "its unalterable support to the movement for the betterment of park conditions in the Mission Potrero, North Beach and other outlying districts." From this I judge that the real estate boomers of the Mission who sought to have the charter amended so as to divert some of the Golden Gate Park fund to their section of the city are now intent upon eliciting the support of residents of other districts by suggestionizing them as to the desirability of getting a share of the money. It has been resolved at Father Crowley's instigation to keep up the agitation for the improvement of public squares. Which means of course that the charter amendment submitted for the benefit of the Mission and beaten at the last election is to be proposed again. Eventually of course it will be carried. In a probability it will be carried the next time it is proposed, for perhaps not many people will take a personal interest in the next election. But of course the people of the Mission will go to the polls and swell the vote in the affirmative.

Booms of the Past

There is great enthusiasm in the Mission these days. The Mission has been bubbling over with enthusiasm ever since the fire. Before the fire, rather after the founding of the Mission in 1876, that district was threatened with a boom about every ten years. As long ago as when the Southern Pacific carried people to San Jose a Valencia street from the depot at Twelfth and Market, the people of the Mission looked forward to the time when resident lots in the farm belt would be selling at $400 a front foot. Then many years later Sixteenth street was extended through the Old Mission cemetery the people of the Mission were sure that the ferry boats would soon be running to Oakland from the foot of Sixteenth street, a thoroughfare which they pointed to with great pride on account of its great width. Property was sold at boom prices in expectation of the change in the ferry service that never came. In time the people of the Mission quit rainbow-chasing and settled down to the peaceful existence that was lived when Woodward Gardens was the city's great playground. But they were to be filled with vain hopes once more. A real estate agent opened a picnic park in a valley where the goats used to graze somewhere in the neighborhood of the House of Correction, and he advertised the dawn of a new era and sold town lots in the midst of vegetable gardens and uncertified dairies. Once more the people of the Mission made preparations for the fish, and once more their expectations were disappointed. Misled by false symptoms of prosperity they went on paying taxes, and all the while the residence districts were stretching westward and northward much to the perplexity of the people to the southward, who could not account for the perversity of their fellow-citizens. But they were steadfast in their faith of the ultimate drift of population toward the county line. So they widened the Mission road to prepare for the traffic, much to the satisfaction of the Italians who, as they take their siesta on their wagon-beds of manure appreciate a broad highway. In time it was demonstrated that all the works of man were in vain; nothing short of an earthquake could vitalize the Mission. And now either Crowley to help the Mission profit from the kindness of Providence is agitating for an appropriation to make the hills bloom where formerly the goats grazed. His purpose is to transform the Mission into one vast garden from Ocean View to Matt Sullivan's leased lot at the corner of Market and Valencia.

The Career of an Assassin

Since the death in Los Angeles a few weeks ago of Count Camilio de Rudio who in 1858 attempted to assassinate Napoleon III newspaper writers have been reviving the stories of the several attempts that were made to assassinate the first Napoleon, but as yet I have seen no allusion to the fact that one of the most distinguished of the men that conspired against the Corsican, like de Rudio, is also buried in this country where he lived for many years. I refer to the Chevalier de Limoelan whose bones are lying in the crypt of the Church of the Visitation in Georgetown. This is a fact that is not widely known. Limoelan was a Chouan who believed that the death of Napoleon was essential to the peace and prosperity of France. With a companion named Saint-Rejant he conspired to assassinate the First Consul. That was in December, 1800. They bought an iron cask, filled it with powder, flints, pebbles and pieces of iron, and put it on a cart which on Christmas eve they stationed in a street not far from the Tuileries. Napoleon was to go to the opera that night to hear the first performance of Haydn's oratorio Saul. Limoelan posted himself at a corner where he could see Napoleon's carriage emerge from the Tuileries courtyard, and he was to signal Saint-Rejant, who was standing near the cart with a lighted pipe in his mouth. Saint-Rejant was to apply the pipe to a fuse which, it was calculated, would burn six or seven seconds. When the escort of cavalry emerged from the courtyard Saint-Rejant was watching for the signal, but at that moment Limoelan experienced a change of heart, a twinge of conscience. He did not give the signal. Presently Saint-Rejant saw the Grenadiers of the Guard, and he applied the light, but too late. Before the explosion occurred the Consul's carriage had passed. All who were on the spot were killed. Limoelan made his escape, came to this country and made a living by painting portraits. Afflicted with mental torture, he led a nomadic life, and impressed all who met him with his air of deep piety. He became a most devout Catholic, and finally resolved to become a monk. In the year 1807 he entered the priesthood in Baltimore and was assigned to a church in Charleston, South Carolina. He had taken the name of Cloriviere and though known as a friend of the Bourbons, nothing was known of his past history. In 1815 he became spiritual director of the Sisters of the Visitation at Georgetown. So great was his piety and his charity, so many his deeds of kindness, so indefatigable his labors in the interest of the poor and the suffering that he was looked upon as a saint. By the sale of his property in France he obtained money with which he built the Chapel of the Visitation.

An Inscription

Limoelan, or Father Cloriviere, as he was known, died in 1826. His tomb has been covered with fresh flowers ever since. On his tomb is the following inscription:

The Troubles of Frank Lacroix Gardner

Last Sunday the papers contained despatches from Paris narrating the latest troubles of Frank Lacroix Gardner. Frank has had an adventurous career in San Francisco, Australia, London and Paris and it is not in the least surprising that he should be once again in the limelight. The limelight has been bathing his person so long that he is probably restive when it is switched away from him. This time it is a lawsuit which has brought him into prominence. It seems that when Frank was cutting a wide swath in London finance he leased a country place near London known as White Webbs from Lady Meux. But when his funds began running low he decided that he did not need the suburban mansion and broke the lease, giving as his reason that the house was haunted and that the ghosts would not allow him to sleep. The London courts however refused to take judicial notice of the etherial disturbers of Gardner's repose and gave Lady Meux judgment for $60,000. This did not dismay Gardner. He flitted to Paris and announced that he had no domicile in London. So Lady Meux followed him to Paris and got judgment from the French courts. Then Frank declared that he was a bankrupt, and as a matter of fact he did go through the bankruptcy court of Trouville. But the present Mrs. Frank Lacroix Gardner is a very wealthy Spanish woman, and the inexorable French courts are going to force her to put under the hammer the splendid collection of paintings which Gardner has transferred to her after spending his lifetime in gathering them.

He Eloped with "Cad, the Tomboy"

There are plenty of men in San Francisco who remember when Frank Lacroix Gardner was doorkeeper at the old Bush Street Theater twenty-five years ago. He was there when Carrie Swain was making her great hit in "Cad, the Tomboy" and one day the town was treated to the sensational news that she had eloped with Frank Gardner on a steamer, bound for Australia. It was even said that Mrs. Gardner who had in some way secured advance information of his intention, stood on Telegraph Hill with her little child and watched the steamer as it passed through the Golden Gate. Gardner went to West Australia and became identified with the Coolgardie mines, the result being that he amassed a fortune. Finding Australia too restricted a field for his newly developed talents he went to London and followed in the footsteps of the notorious Hooley by organizing the Frank Gardner Syndicate which dabbled in all sorts of American investments. One of his enterprises was the marketing of the automobile which was then coming rapidly into favor. He became the personal friend of the Prince of Wales (afterwards King Edward VII) but incurred his disfavor by a characteristic bit of impudence. Accompanying the Prince to Paris he arranged to have a phalanx of cameramen on hand to photograph the Prince and himself as they rode through the streets in an automobile. He used these pictures for advertising purposes and the Prince never forgave him.

His Second Marriage

Ten years ago Gardner made a splurge in copper and went broke. But his resources were not exhausted. He met in Paris a very beautiful Spanish woman with a large fortune and resolved to marry her. Carrie Swain brought suit against him, and although she could not establish her claim as his wife the French courts decided that as they had lived together for years she was entitled to redress and before he could marry his Spanish inamorata he had to pay "Cad, the Tomboy" a big sum of money. Meanwhile Gardner had been gathering the fine collection of pictures which he is now likely to lose. In his gallery are the beautiful Winterhalter portraits of Napoleon and Eugenie and masterpieces of Murillo, Titian and Corot. If they are put under the hammer they should yield more than enough to satisfy the judgment obtained by Lady Meux.

"Why do you watch the baseball bulletins so carefully?" asked one woman.

"My husband is an enthusiast over the game," replied the other. "I make it a rule never to discuss household or millinery expenses with him except on days when the home team wins."

The Success of Charlotte Thompson

Charlotte Thompson who came back to San Francisco with Lillian Russell, no doubt to enjoy the pleasure of seeing her play "In Search of a Sinner" produced in her home town, has achieved a wonderful success since she left here several years ago. Miss Thompson taught school at one time for a modest $80 a month and afterwards wrote dramatic criticism for the Call. Times have changed for her. At the present time she enjoys an income of from $25,000 to $30,000 a year. One of her first plays was "The Stronger Sex," written for Florence Roberts. Then came her dramatization of "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm" from the novel by Kate Douglas Wiggin. This has been one of the biggest theatrical successes of the generation and continues to draw with unimpaired power. From Margaret Deland's novel she constructed "The Awakening of Helena Ritchie" which is not much of a play but has provided Margaret Anglin with a very successful vehicle for her emotional talents. And now she has scored again by writing "In Search of a Sinner" for the airy fairy on Charlotte Thompson could retire today and live in affluence for the rest of her life.

The Orator of the Day

In the annual memorial services of the Elks which are to be held next Sunday at the Prince of Wales Theater more than the usual interest has been aroused owing to the announcement that the oration will be delivered by Mr. John A. Britton of the Oakland lodge. Mr. Britton is known on this side of the bay as the courteous president of the Pacific and the San Francisco Gas and Electric Companies, but in Oakland he is not known for his gift of oratory. He is one of the highest of after-dinner speakers, and on more than one occasion he has divided honors with some of the most eloquent men in the State.

Sacramento's Naughty Clubmen

During the past week there was a vaudeville entertainer at one of the cheaper theaters in the city whose specialty was the singing of "The Grizzly Bear," an effusion capable of rather suggestive treatment. This woman whose name is Sophie Tucker was arrested when she sang the song in Portland and has since been making capital of her dubious distinction. In Sacramento there are a lot of people who wish they had never heard of her. It seems that while she was appearing in that city the University Club gave jinks and requested her to contribute to the program. She gladly accepted. From the Sacramento Bee I learn that her performance at the gathering of college men was "many times as tense as her act at the local playhouse." And that "her criminality was much more clear and conclusive than it was at the exhibition for which he was cast into the lockup at Portland." I can have no further particulars as to this "criminality" because the Bee is modestly silent. But it goes on to say that after she had sung songs which would have raised a riot in a Moorish harem," she formed her audience into a circle and started a story-telling symposium and kept "laying over local raconteurs till past one the next morning." I learn too that her manner of telling story "adds a special seasoning to spice itself." No particular trouble would have resulted from this publication had not the Bee included a list of those present. That started a hubbub which has increased when two pulpiteers made the jinks subject for thumping invective. Then somebody said that the University Club jinks was no worse than some which had been given at the Elks and the Sutter Club—and the war was on. Husbands are trying to explain to their wives, young men to their sweethearts; and all whose names were published swear softly when Sophie Tucker is mentioned. But just the same there is great curiosity among those who were not present to learn what songs Sophie sang and what stories she told.

Near-Riot in Oakland

Madame Liza Lehmann is a wonderful artist but her vocal powers cannot compete with the combined melody of a steam-hammer and a donkey engine. This was demonstrated on the afternoon last week when she gave a recital in

Ye Liberty Playhouse, Oakland. Part of the building in which Ye Liberty is housed was being reconstructed, a circumstance which Madame Lehmann's manager did not take into consideration. When Madame Lehmann began to sing her notes were drowned by the whistling of the donkey engine and the pounding of the steam-hammer. The singer strove manfully to hold her own against the noise, but it was a losing fight and at the second interruption there was a concerted movement of music lovers toward the door of the theater. Oaklanders become more excited over such trifles than our blase San Franciscans and by the time the throng had reached the box office chorusing a demand for the return of its money, the demonstration began to assume the proportions of a riot. However the man in the box office rose to the occasion, calmed the angry mob and sent everybody home satisfied.

Tetrazzini and the Interpreters

The legal coils in which Tetrazzini was enmeshed in New York freshens our memory of her difficulties in this city. The diva has a genius for getting to law. I wonder whether any of the New York interpreters received the shock which she gave to those employed in our courts? Probably not, as the singer is very proud of her knowledge of English nowadays. At the time when she was lawing with her South American manager in this city she spoke very little English and an Italian interpreter was called into court to translate her testimony. He proved unsatisfactory and another was sent for. He too failed to please. When the last of the available Italian interpreters had been dismissed by the exacting prima donna, the crestfallen linguists were taken aback to hear her announce to the court: "These gentlemen cannot speak Italian. I will give my testimony in English." It was weeks before they recovered from the shock.

Are We to be Camphor Producers?

Mr. C. H. McIsaac is the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce of Santa Cruz and a man possessed of genuine public spirit. From the Santa Cruz Sentinel I learn that on Thanksgiving Day Mr. McIsaac offered to the city and the citizens of Santa Cruz one thousand camphor trees. This is a gift fraught with the most interesting possibilities. It may mean that the State of California is to embark on the camphor industry now monopolized by Japan. Two years ago Mr. McIsaac imported from Japan a pound of camphor tree seed and planted it at his home place near Del Mar. The trees were a great success and he has raised a thousand of them which he has placed at the disposal of the community. Merely as a tree of beauty the camphor is not to be despised, but it is the possibility that Mr. McIsaac has started a commercial industry which interests people outside of Santa Cruz. The world's supply of camphor comes from the Island of Formosa which belongs to Japan. The camphor plantations of Formosa are managed in a most unscientific way. The trees are allowed to grow until they are fifty years old and are then cut down and the camphor gum is extracted. Obviously this is a slow and extravagant process. If camphor can be produced in California on scientific principles the Japanese monopoly of this extremely valuable industry can be destroyed. Some time ago the British experimented with camphor trees in Jamaica, but the gum was of a quality inferior to that of Formosa. Just why this was so we will probably know when certain experiments now being made at the University of Kansas are completed. These experiments will probably settle the question as to whether camphor can be produced in the warm regions of the United States. If it can, a new industry will arise in California and Mr. McIsaac of Santa Cruz will be entitled to a great deal of credit.

Social Prattle

By TANTALUS

They Started to Smoke

What might have been a decided sensation furnishing material for nine days' teatable chatter was quietly quashed in the supper room of the St. Francis on Monday evening of last week. It was at what the bavardes would call a brilliant gathering of our society folk who had motored downtown for a bite and a sip after spending the evening at the Valencia Theater. As a matter of fact it was a very interesting gathering, for nearly all those who lay claim to social exclusiveness were scattered through the room. At one table sat two well known matrons, the center of a merry group, and by no means the least handsome or the least elaborately gowned of their party. Having taken the edge from their midnight appetites these two matrons produced dainty golden cases and drew out gold-tipped cigarettes. They had applied them to their lips and were in the act of lighting them when one of the employes of the hotel glided up to the table and whispered a well-chosen word or two of prohibition. So there was nothing for these two well known matrons to do but to defer their smoking until they had sought the privacy of their limousines.

The Display of Necks

Speaking of this gathering of fashion reminds me that I haven't seen such a collection of bare necks since the fire. Our smart ladies seem to have been unanimous in deciding that they would outstrip themselves on that occasion. There were all sorts of necks exposed to the general gaze—fat necks, thin necks, long necks and brawny necks, short necks, bony necks, red necks and scrawny necks. I am not absolutely correct anatomically in speaking of necks, for there was more on display than mere neck. The gowns were nearly all cut so low as to show a liberal expanse of chest in front and of backbone in the rear. Some of them were so cunningly contrived that one imagined every moment would precipitate the sort of exposure which would be bound to embarrass both sexes. Personally I can testify that I blushed for some of the ladies and feared that others would catch cold. It was not altogether a pleasant display. If a maid should be prodigal about unmasking her beauty to the chaste moon, some of our aging matrons should be slow to reveal their charms to the garish electric light. The poet speaks of the lines where beauty lingers, but there is nothing poetical in the lines whence beauty has fled. They are hard lines and they should be discreetly draped. Only those ladies should dress decollete who retain their youthful charms or possess skillful masques.

Willis Polk and Pavlowa

Last Tuesday night Willis Polk, architect and clubman, came unexpectedly into the limelight and for a few minutes was considered the recipient of special consideration from Mademoiselle Pavlowa, the great Russian dancer. Willis was at the Valencia Theater with a stag party which included Ned Greenway, Charles De Young, Wellington Gregg, Edgar Mizner and Thornwell Mullally. Toward the close of the performance Mlle. Pavlowa danced a Fantaisie to the accompaniment of a beautiful harp obligato by Drigo. It was one of her prettiest numbers and at its conclusion there were thunders of applause. After curtsying again and again to the audience the danseuse etoile glided to the right hand side of the stage and made a profound bow, apparently to Willis Polk who sat in the front of the box. Everybody's eyes followed the dancer and thinking that a signal honor had been conferred on Polk, everybody buzzed a comment to his neighbor, for it was one of those audiences in which everybody knew everybody else. The applause thundered again and again Pavlowa bowed to the audience and once more glided over toward the box and seemed to renew her acknowledgments to Polk who was applauding as vigorously as anyone else. Again there was a buzz of comment from all parts of the theater and every glass was leveled at the architect. But just then Mr. Theodore Stier rapped with his baton on his music rack and made a sweeping gesture toward the harpist who sat just beneath Polk at the end of the orchestra. The harpist began his obligato once more and then for the first time everybody realized that Pavlowa had been bowing, not to Polk but to the musician who had rendered such a fine accompaniment for her dance.

A Dramatic Critic to Marry

It affords me unusual pleasure to chronicle here the engagement of Mr. Ralph E. Renaud, the brilliant dramatic critic of the Chronicle, to Miss Helen Lamson of Portland. Our firstnighters have guessed for some time that Mr. Renaud was going to forsake the ranks of bachelordom on account of his constant appearance at the theaters with a very charming young lady to whom he has been suspected of paying as much attention as to the plays on which he exercised his critical judgment. Their surmises are now verified. Mr. Renaud's affianced is the daughter of the late Captain Roswell H. Lamson, U.S.N. She is a Stanford girl and a member of the Delta Gamma sorority. As Mr. Renaud was at Stanford at the same time as his bride-to-be, the romance may be traced to their college days. Mr. Renaud was a member of the Zeta Psi fraternity. No arrangements have yet been made for the wedding but it will take place in the early part of January. Mr. Renaud is a newspaperman of distinction who has a large following of readers in this city. He was formerly on the staffs of the Examiner and Bulletin, but his best work has been done since he became the dramatic critic of the Chronicle. A keenly trained esthetic sense, a sensitive love of beauty and a discriminating knowledge of the ancient and modern drama have made his critical expressions valuable to all our lovers of the drama, and he possesses a finished style which puts the stamp of literature on his work. In the newspaper craft his popularity is attested by the sincere congratulations which he is receiving and in which I most heartily join.

The First Skating Party

I heard a lady remark at the skating rink on Tuesday evening, "No wonder Inez Shorb first fascinated a gallant navy officer and then a army officer. If Mrs. Buck had been born a man she would have been a brigadier general." She is indeed a born leader. Every thing was perfect and went without a hitch. The hall was at tically decorated, the music was of the best and Mrs. Buck received each guest with such gracious cordiality that all felt perfectly at home. Mrs. Buck was dressed in a very handsome dark blue tailor made with a becoming turban which set off her dark Spanish beauty to perfection. She wore a single American beauty rose. Mrs. Eleanor Martin gave over the Knights of Columbus Ball in order to be present. But Queen Eleanor did not put on skates. There was a very large attendance. The young people at first seemed timid about venturing upon the floor, but later became enthusiastic and skated until the last strain of the music and were loth to go. The best skaters among the matrons were Mrs. James Collins, formerly Miss Mary Belle Gwin (she wore a pretty costume of black and white plaid) and Mrs. George Hill Stoddard, formerly Miss Bessie Bates. Many thought Miss Julia Langhorne one of the best skaters while others noted the grace of Miss Partridge. Miss Guissie Foute came in for her share of praise. Miss Dora Winn, the pretty debutante, was quite proficient in taking the fancy steps, especially the "two step"; in fact Miss Winn and Miss Lancel of San Rafael were the only two present who were brave enough to attempt it. Of the men Jack and Southard Hoffman and Bernardo Shorb carried off the honors.

The Costumes Were Handsome

Almost all the debutantes were present. There were some very handsome costumes worn. Miss Ethel Shorb looked extremely pretty in dark blue with a large picture hat and knowing ones noted that she wore orchids. Mrs. John McGaw wore one of the handsomest dresses of the evening, black velvet with an ermine collar and hat to match. Miss Dorothy Chapman wore a tailor made and plain white shirt waist; she seemed to enjoy herself thoroughly. The Misses Otis were effectively gowned. Of a truth all the young girls were extremely well dressed; nearly all of them had very handsome furs, and worried the older ladies by wearing them all evening while skating. There was an unusually large number of spectators present and the chairs were filled with many young men who did not venture forth at all. I hear that already a large number of skating parties are being formed for the next meeting which takes place on December 13.

She Heard a Snore

Rather a good story is going the rounds at the expense of one of the prettiest and most feted of the season's debutantes. The home of this interesting young lady in the Western Addition was converted into two imposing flats after the death of her grandmother. The upper flat is occupied by the family of our bud while the lower has been rented to a bachelor group. One midnight last week the voice of the bud broke the stillness of the home. "Father! Mother! come quickly! There is a man under my bed!" she screamed at the top of her voice. The whole family was aroused and rushed into the room. "Listen," commanded the bud who looked like Lucia in the mad scene. They listened and sure enough they heard distinctly the snore of a man. The boldest member of the family peered under the bed, but there was no man there. So they listened again and realized that the snore came from the flat below. Our bud is convinced that one of those bachelors downstairs is the loudest snorer in town.

They Will Move to Cuba

The Harry MacFarlanes who have returned to Honolulu after spending some time in this city and being very extensively entertained, are about to move their lares and penates from the islands. Their future home will be Cuba. The MacFarlane family is a prominent one in Honolulu and helped to make history there in the good old days before the American flag was hoisted. Mrs. MacFarlane was Polly Dunn of this city.

Will the Merry Widow Reappear?

Clubdom is in an interrogatory mood with the coming of the polo season. It wants to know what visiting teams will appear in action here or as to how strong Burlingame will be. Also it wonders whether the "Merry Widow" of the last Coronado tournament will revisit us. This matron, a dashing beautiful brunette, was from Denver and made a decided impression during the fortnight of sports. Previous to her appearance on the scene, society did its swimming every noon in the bathhouse tanks, even Eleanor Sears passing up the surf. But all was changed with the arrival of the fair Denverite on the scene. For disdaining the tanks she made for the surf in a striking suit that well displayed her figure. Society soon followed for the men deserted the tanks and the maids and matrons were not going to be left in the background when it got so bad that Cyril Tobin took a header off the pier into a raging surf because the widow had dared him to. Clubdom wonders, "Will the 'Merry Widow' be at Coronado again?"

Pin Money for the Eastlands

I notice that Superior Judge Gosbey of San Jose made an order the other day distributing to the heirs of the late Alice L. Eastland fifty-three shares of San Francisco Savings bank stock, valued at about $35,000. As the heirs in question are Tom and Joe Eastland the action of the court supplies these two well known scions of our aristocracy with a pretty penny of pin money. When their mother died ten years ago the estate was valued at about $500,000 and it has been in probate ever since. The greater portion has already been distributed and efforts are now being made to have the residue settled up. The administrator, F. A. Hihn, opposed the recent distribution, but more from reasons of book-keeping, I believe, than anything else. I suppose Joe Eastland will find his share of this $35,000 very handy after his European trip which was a prolonged and expensive one. He spent considerable money, it will be recalled, in cablegrams to the newspapers announcing his engagement to Vesta Shortridge Bruguere. Since Joe astounded everybody here by those cablegrams from Turin, he has returned to this country but is a little bashful about coming home, so he loiters in New York. Meanwhile the vivacious Vesta seems to have sought the seclusion of the dim-lit background.

Honeymooning Near the Firing Line

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Scott Brooke arrived a day or two ago from Mexico where their honeymoon was spent. For a time their family and friends were uneasy about them. They were traveling through the land of Diaz when the revolution broke out and the Pomeroy family tried in vain to reach them by wire. Finally last week a letter was received from the happy pair in the City of Mexico where they were blissfully ignorant of any anxiety over them. They men-
